The officers of the National Drainage Association felt that if the Government could do that for the arid lands located long distances from the great markets and the great consuming centers, it could and should do the same for the drainage areas of the country, the larger part of which were much closer to markets and near the center of the United States.

The first bill was introduced in 1928. It created a revolving and near the center of the United States.

The first bill was introduced in 1928. It created a revolving fund which was to be administered by the Secretary of the Interior, who would loan money to drainage and levee districts over a period of 40 years without interest.

The first hearings were held before the House committee in 1929. No report was asked as it was the short session of the outgoing administration. The second bill was introduced in 1930. Hearings were held on it before the House Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation and the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. In 1931 the bill was passed by the United States Senate without a dissenting vote but did not reach a vote in the House.

In an effort, however, to get it before the House, the officers of our association consented to two amendments, one permitting what we term "private irrigation projects"—those not financed by the Federal Government—to come under the bill, and the other providing for 3 per cent interest on the money borrowed other providing for 3 per cent interest on the money borrowed from the Government.

The last bill, introduced in the first session of the present Congress and now before that body, creates a revolving fund of $100,000,000, with $20,000,000 available annually for five years. It is to be administered by the Secretary of the Interior, who is authorized to make loans to levee, drainage, and irrigation districts (other than Federal projects) over a period of 40 years at 3 per cent interest. It provides further, that no payments of any kind come due the first five years, during which time the interest accrues; that during the second 5-year period only the interest will be required, and that during the remaining 30 years the principal of the indebtedness and accrued interest is to be paid in equal installments. in equal installments.

After bringing witnesses from every section of the United States that has this problem, which covers practically every State south of the Potomac and west of Pennsylvania, favorable reports were secured from the House Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation and the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, without a dissenting vote in either committee. The bill is now on the Calendar of both the House and the Senate with unanimous

Our original intention was to make a strong effort to secure its enactment in the present short session now drawing to a close. Owing to the opposition of the present administration, however, which has blocked our efforts for the past two sessions, and because of the friendly and sympathetic attitude of not only the President elect, but also his closest advisers, who state that our legislation comes within the principle announced by the President legislation comes within the principle announced by the President elect in his Topeka farm speech, where he said he would endeavor to work out a program that will prevent the bankruptcy of farmers and the loss of farms and agricultural lands, we decided to wait until the special session, at which time we will make one more strong effort to pass the bill and if we fail in that attempt drop it as many people are working on this matter at such great sacrifices to themselves that we must get results promptly or discontinue the effort.

The advocates of our legislation feel that the enactment of this bill and the putting into effect of its provisions will do more than any one thing that can be done for the farmers in the improvement districts at this time. The effect would be like lifting a wet blanket off the shoulders of hundreds of thousands and would put new life, hope, and enthusiasm into those who are farming improvement district lands.

It provides every safeguard for the Government, requiring the

It provides every safeguard for the Government, requiring the necessary legal investigations, to see that each district that ap-plies is a legally constituted entity and has the taxing power of the State back of it. It requires an engineering survey to see that the district assisted will function under normal conditions. It also requires an appraisal of the value of the property and an economic survey of the district so that the Secretary of the Interior will loan only the amount his investigations show will be repaid to the Government.

As amended by the Senate committee, the bill also includes a provision that the Secretary of the Interior, in determining the amount of each loan, must take into consideration the actual value of the bonds, and that the bond owners must agree to remit the difference between their face and their actual value, so that the benefit of the discount will go to the farmers and landowners and not to those who are speculating in the securities against their property. That will permit the refinancing of these districts under conditions most favorable to the farmers.

We are advised by those familiar with the situation throughout the country that if the cash was available to pay for them that, taken as a whole, the owners of the bonds would be glad to surrender them at this time at an average price not to exceed 50 cents on the dollar. That would mean an immediate reduction of 50 per cent of the farmers' indebtedness. By doubling the length of time for paying the principal of the indebtedness and reducing the rate of interest from 6 per cent to 3 per cent it would mean a further reduction in the annual payments of 50 per cent, which altogether would mean a total reduction in the annual installments on his improvement indebtedness of 75 per cent. If the bonds can be purchased for less than 50 cents on the dollar, which is the case in many instances, the reduction will be greater, and if they cost more the reduction will be less. In cases where the bonds are not in default and would have to be refunded at par or face value it would still mean a 50 per cent reduction in the annual taxes.

In addition to that, the 5-year moratorium would permit the or face value it would still mean a 50 per cent reduction in the annual taxes.

In addition to that, the 5-year moratorium would permit the landowners to catch up on their State, county, and school taxes, pay off their chattel mortgages, their notes at the bank, their accounts at the stores, and once more go on a cash basis. That, my friends, would make it more than farm relief—it would be bank relief, business relief, and community relief.

This legislation will put these districts on their feet from the physical and engineering as well as from the financial standpoint. To illustrate: A district that has $200,000 of bonds outstanding and is not functioning properly because it is in need of some clean-out work on its ditches, an enlarged outlet, or even some additional ditches, and so forth, applies for a loan; the engineering survey of that district will disclose the needs. The Secretary of the Interior could then say, "Our department will make the loan but will require that $50,000 or $60,000 of the money be spent in remedying the physical defects of the district in order to restore its efficiency. That would call for new work when it can be done at the lowest price and at a time when it is badly needed. Bear in mind, gentlemen, these farmers are not seeking a gift, merely a loan; not a donation, just an extension of credit. It is not a dole, for it merely helps the farmers help themselves to pay their debts and save their homes. It is not even an expense but a safe, sound investment, for properly administered it will not cost the Government 1 cent and the money will be repaid with interest.

Remember also that the farmers in these improvement dis-

Remember also that the farmers in these improvement districts have their State, county, and school taxes to pay and every item of expense other farmers are compelled to meet. The passage of this bill will merely put them on a basis of equality with other farmers.

Several eastern business men have told me personally, that it is one farm-relief program they can support 100 per cent. They say the legislation is sound fundamentally and economically; that it merely follows the principles worked out by big business; that it merely follows the principles worked out by big business; that when railroads or large industrial enterprises can not meet their obligations, the security holders lengthen the time of payment and lower the rate of interest, and when the possibility of paying the whole amount is hopeless, as is the case with many improvement districts at the present time, they also reduce the amount of the indebtedness, just as it is our plan to do.

A high official of one large insurance company reminded me that what we are trying to do for the improvement districts is what Senator Morrow did for Mexico and what our Government has been doing for foreign nations. If it is right to do that for railroads industrial enterprises, for foreign nations and foreign debt-roads, industrial enterprises, for foreign nations and foreign debt-ors, surely it ought not be wrong to do the same thing for over a million farmers in the United States who have given the best years of their life to developing their fine farms and have ex-hausted their resources, which represents in most cases their lifetime savings and in many instances the savings and sacrifices of hard-working parents ahead of them.

The improvement assessments were placed against their land when farm products were selling at much higher prices and it now takes from four to five bales of cotton, bushels of wheat or corn, pounds of beef, pork, lard, etc., to pay what one would when the bonds for the improvement work were sold against their land.

Bear in mind that the individual farmer and land owner in these districts is helpless because even though he is able to meet his assessment from outside resources, he is penalized by increased taxes when his neighbor or other landowners default in the payment of their assessments.

The argument is advanced by some that this will increase the cultivated area of the country at a time when it is not needed. That is not true. The bill is confined to organized and existing That is not true. The bill is confined to organized and existing districts and does not apply to any new projects. Where there is still cut-over land in some districts, existing conditions are forcing it into cultivation as rapidly as possible, for the man who owns it must either clear it and get it into a producing state or abandon it. If he abandons the land it will be sold for taxes and the chances are, it will be bought in by someone for a song. The purchase price to the new owner will represent only the clearing and improvement cost which is small at this time. If, however, the tax is reduced, as it will be under this bill, most of the cut-over timber land will remain in that state until economic conditions justify bringing it into cultivation.

Some say it is "putting the Government into business." There

Some say it is "putting the Government into business." There a difference, however, between the Government getting into usiness and the legitimate extension of credit. Through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, the Government is now making loans to railroads, insurance companies, banks and other corporations organized for personal and private gain. Surely if private corporations owned principally by investors who are not producers are entitled to Government credit, improvement districts that are not only political subdivisions but great cooperative enterprises, so to speak, which are owned by farmers who are producing the food we eat and basic materials for the clothes we wear, and who have exhausted their resources in undertakings from which the public has derived such great benefits, should be entitled to the same consideration.

from which the public has derived such great benefits, should be entitled to the same consideration.

A seed loan bill has just passed the Congress and been approved by the President, carrying an appropriation of $90,000,000. The benefits of that legislation will be only temporary and of no permanent value, while the beneficial effect of our legislation will last for many years. Experience has proven that a large part of the seed money will be lost, while the funds advanced for refinancing of improvement districts will be repaid to the Government with interest.

financing of improvement districts will be repaid to the Government with interest.

I also feel sure no one will deny that the seed loans increase production at a time when we already have agricultural surpluses, while the refinancing of improvement districts will have the opposite effect, for under present conditions, with high improvement taxes to meet, the individual farmer in these districts, notwithstanding the effect of his action on his neighbor, on the surplus, or on the general agricultural situation, is forced to not only plant his land to cash crops but to make each acre he owns produce to the limit of his ability and the capacity of his land. If he does not, the loan company or the tax collector will soon have a deed to his land. If, however, his tax burden is lowered, he can then reduce his acreage of cash crops, put some of his land in permanent pasture, raise more livestock, and practice other methods of diversification instead of increasing the production of crops of which we already have an exportable surplus.

Some time ago Congress appropriated $125,000,000 for the benefit of Federal land banks, which the president of the Federal Farm Loan Board recently stated assisted 93,093 borrowers of that system. The appropriation of four-fifths of that amount for the revolving fund in our bill will bring relief to hundreds of thousands of farmers who are equally entitled to 'tt. I think anyone who is fair will agree it is not right to make fish of one small group of farmers and fowl of a much larger.

In that connection, I want to call your attention also to the who is fair will agree it is not right to make hish of the small group of farmers and fowl of a much larger.

In that connection, I want to call your attention also to the fact that the Federal land banks, the joint-stock land banks, the insurance companies, and the farm-loan companies are all refusing to make loans on lands in improvement districts. The passing to make loans on lands in improvement districts. The passing to make loans on lands in improvement districts. sage of our bill will remove that discrimination and make any credit provided for other farmers available to farmers in those

At the present time a number of mortgage-relief bills are before Congress, but you know and I know that no bill of that character Congress, but you know and I know that no bill of that character that either ignores the improvement indebtedness which, except for general taxes, is a first lien on these lands, or fails to provide for those annual assessments, can work or be of any real benefit to farmers and landowners in these improvement districts. All of the able and logical arguments that are being advanced, however, for easing the burden and lightening the load of the farmer's mortgage indebtedness apply with equal or even greater force to his improvement indebtedness.

In the closing days of the first session of the present Congress it also passed the home loan bank bill, to assist those living in cities to save their homes. I have no criticism of that action, but maintain that it is more important for farmers to save their homes than it is for those in the cities, for when the resident of a city loses his home he keeps his job and goes ahead with his work, but when a farmer is sold out he not only loses his home but also his means of making a living and in most cases is forced to move to the city, where he swells the ranks of the unemployed.

If this bill is not passed, what is going to happen to these districts? You know, without me telling you, that they are defaulting every day and either going into receivership or into the hands of bondholders' protective committees, which means that they are going backward. Maintenance is as much a part of a drainage or irrigation system as its original construction and when it is neglected the district loses its efficiency, which further increases the difficulties of the landowners to meet their assessments.

It would be not only an insult to your profession but a great economic waste, a crime against our civilization, and a rank injustice to the hundreds of thousands of our people who have given their energy, their ability, and the best part of their lives to developing these projects to allow them to go back to swamps. Let's not abandon them. Let's follow the suggestion made by President-elect Roosevelt in his plan for the development of the Tennessee River Valley, in which he advocated putting back to forests the poor, low-producing, and marginal lands, and developing the rich reclaimed areas into a still higher state of cultivation. That idea will be advanced by the passage of our improvement.

Ing the rich reclaimed areas into a still higher state of cultivation. That idea will be advanced by the passage of our improvement district finance bill and I appeal to you to not only indorse it as an organization but as individuals to urge your respective. States to give us the moral and political support we need to enable us to secure this meritorious legislation in the coming special session of Congress, which the newspapers say is to be called about the middle of April.

Now, you gentlemen and others of your profession, who are not members of your organization, constructed these great projects. They are the creation of your brains and the product of your energy, your training, and your ability. You reclaimed land from the stubborn deserts and the sickly and treacherous swamps that under normal conditions will permit farmers to maintain their families on the American standard of living. You have a just right to feel proud of your work for to-day these districts just right to feel proud of your work for to-day these districts represent the most fertile sections of our country and have become national assets.

Please do not abandon them. Help us secure our legislation—it will save them.

FOREIGN DEBTS DUE UNITED STATES

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, if I am not unduly interrupted by Senators, I shall not trespass upon their attention at great length.

The subject matter of the debts of certain foreign nations due us and to become due us has been many times mentioned in the Senate, and, because of default and rumored default in payment of principal and interest due us and to become due us under existing written agreements, we have made comment and indulged in more or less perfervid speech. For like reason the press has discussed this subject matter and in many instances has confused rather than informed the people. The facts to which I shall call attention are, of course, available to those who have the time to search through official records. I hope to relieve them from much of that labor.

This is not the time or place to prejudge or to indulge in denunciation of heretofore and, I trust, now friendly nations. I do not rise to condemn or to praise, to deliver a philippic against any nation, or to pronounce a eulogy on my own. I do not desire to create animosity in the heart of the debtor nations or to rouse resentment in the heart of our people, which would tend to prevent a calm, dispassionate consideration of the subject matter. My immediate purpose is to place in our official RECORD certain facts and certain written agreements-undisputed facts and agreements freely entered into. This I purpose doing in order that our people may be better informed as to these facts and these agreements and that, with this definite information, they may form a wise and just opinion as to our rights and duties.

After I have recalled to your attention and placed in the RECORD these facts and agreements I may make some observations as to the course the United States should take and follow in respect to these foreign debts due and to become due us. I anticipate by saying now that I shall be disappointed if these nations forfeit their reputation by even an approach to repudiation of their legal and moral obligations; for I can not believe that they are less honorable than the untutored savage.

The land of Blackstone repudiate its agreement? What! What! The land of Lafayette treat its contract as a "scrap of paper"?

What! The land of Justinian abandon his teaching as to the sanctity of contracts?

What! The land of Kosciusko throw away the legacy of that hero's example?

What! The land of Socrates forget his dying words?

These other Christian nations commit economic suicide by the loss of reputation by breaking their contracts? Will any one of these debtor nations sink to the level of repudiating Russia?

I will not believe it. I pay them the credit of believing that their default has been due to present emergency and evidences no intent to repudiate their plighted word. For I continue to believe that there is honor among honorable nations even as there is honor among honorable men.

In reply to my letter addressed to the Secretary of the Treasury, I received a communication from Mr. James H. Douglas, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, reading as to the United States and the agreements made by the commission for the settlement of such indebtedness. There appears on page 81 of this document a statement showing the principal amount of obligations of foreign governments originally acquired by the United States. On pages 318 to 328, inclusive, are tables showing the dates and amounts of cash advances to foreign governments.

showing the dates and amounts of cash advances to foreign governments under the Liberty bond acts and the dates and amounts of the obligations received for war and relief supplies. The statement on page 331 shows the prearmistice and postarmistice indebtedness of foreign governments to the United States.

The foregoing tables include all of the obligations acquired from foreign governments except obligations in the prinicipal amount of $265,245 received in 1927 from the Government of Nicaragua in payment of surplus materials sold on credit and a cash loan of $12,167,000 made to the Government of Greece in May, 1929, pursuant to the act of Congress approved February 14, 1929. This loan was based on a commitment made by the United States Government under an agreement executed in February. States Government under an agreement executed in February, 1918, with the Government of Greece in connection with the prosecution of the war.

There is also inclosed a copy of a statement showing the principal of the funded and unfunded indebtedness of foreign governments to the United States, the accrued and unpaid interest thereon, and payments on account of principal and interest as of November 15, 1931. Except for a relatively small accumulation of interest, there has been no change in the amounts shown since that date.

The Government of Germany is indebted to the United States on account of the costs of the American Army of Occupation and the awards entered by the Mixed Claims Commission, United States and Germany, in favor of American nationals and the United States Government. The current status of this indebtedness is shown on the reverse side of the inclosed copy of the statement of the public debts as of September 30, 1932.

The combined annual reports contain copies of all the funding agreements except the agreements with the Governments of Austria, Germany, and Greece. Copies of the agreements with the Governments of Austria and Germany appear in the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury for the fiscal year 1929, and the annual reports for the fiscal year 1930 contains a copy of the agreement with the Government of Greece. The supply of these annual reports has been exhausted, but they are undoubtedly available to you in the Capitol. Copies of the agreements recently concluded with the debtor governments providing for the payment of the amounts due during the fiscal year 1932, for the payment of the amounts due during the fiscal year 1932, which were postponed in accordance with the joint resolution of Congress approved December 23, 1931, are also inclosed.

There is no information available without extensive compilation showing the date and amount of each payment of principal and interest by foreign governments on account of their indebtedness. The total amounts received from foreign governments during the fiscal years 1918 to 1931, inclusive, are set out hereunder.

Schedules showing the receipts from foreign governments for the scredules showing the receipts from foreign governments for the fiscal years 1923 to 1930, inclusive, and estimates of receipts for subsequent years under the debt-funding agreements are transmitted herewith. The payment of the amounts due during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932, was postponed in accordance with the joint resolution of Congress approved December 23, 1931. The postponed amounts, with interest at 4 per cent, are to be repaid over a 10-year period beginning July 1, 1933. There should be added to the estimated receipts from the respective countries for each of the fiscal years 1934 to 1943, inclusive, the amounts shown on the inclosed schedule of payments to be received on account of the amounts postponed during 1932. Very truly yours,

JAMES H. DOUGLAS, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury.

I invite the attention of Senators to this letter, which goes into the details and states facts which we ought to bear in mind and which the people at large should know.

I am in receipt of a later communication from the Assistant Secretary in which he states:

In accordance with your telephonic request the following statement shows the total amounts of principal and interest received from foreign governments on account of their indebtedness to the United States

I ask that that letter may appear in full in the RECORD. The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Balley in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I invite attention to the fact that as to those governments that have defaulted on payments due since July 1, 1932, under their debt-funding agreements, the Assistant Secretary advises me as follows-and I ask that the communication may appear in full in the RECORD without my reading it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Very truly yours,

JAMES H. DOUGLAS,
Assistant Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. It now appears, Mr. President, that up to February 6, 1933, these foreign nations have paid us

It will be kept in mind that these several payments were made pursuant to and in accordance with their agreements freely entered into with us.

This fact, also, should be kept in mind: The United States loaned these nations cash and furnished them supplies prior to and after the armistice, and we did that without demanding, asking for, or receiving any security, confidently relying on their promise and honor to pay us on demand, for we held what may be called their demand obligations.

Thereafter Great Britain and other nations, through their accredited representatives, came to Washington and entered into written agreements with us to pay us certain amounts at certain times, for it will be borne in mind that we held demand obligations, and these nations came here to agree upon the amounts due and to arrange as to time or times of payment.

Here in Washington, at the opening meeting of the Anglo-American Debt Commission, on Monday, January 8, 1923, Hon. Stanley Baldwin, member of Parliament, Chancellor of the Exchequer, made a speech concerning "payments of our debts to you," as he expressed it. From that speech I wish to quote.

I am tempted to pause to invite the attention of those who hear me or who may read my remarks to the fact that the then Chancellor of the Exchequer came to this city and uttered these words, and that he said the British representatives came for the purpose of arranging for the payment of "our debts to you"-the United States. In that speech he

Had it been possible to find in the world a nugget of gold worth $4,000,000,000, we would have spared no sacrifice to secure it, and we would have brought it with us; but, unfortunately, the limitations of nature put such a simple method of payment out of the question, and we have to explore other means.

He further said:

In common with the rest of the world, we have watched with admiration the open-handed charity of America to the stricken countries of Europe, to the peoples of Belgium, of France, of Russia. The generosity of America is proverbial, but we are not here to ask for favors or to impose on generosity. We want, on such terms as will produce the least possible disturbance in the trade relations of the two countries, a fair business settlement, a square deal, a settlement that will secure for America the repayment to the last cent of those credits which the United States Government established in America for us, their associates in the war. Our wish is to approach the discussion as business men war. Our wish is to approach the discussion as business men seeking a business solution of what is fundamentally a business problem. * * The cordial and prompt agreement of the two greatest democracies of the world on a question of this intricacy and magnitude will be an example to the nations and a long step forward in effecting a solution of the economic troubles of Europe. Let us never forget that until these troubles are solved there can be no general revival of international trade. For myself-

Said the chancellor-

I look forward to the meetings of the commission with hope and confidence. I believe that I shall not be disappointed.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. My attention was diverted for a moment. and I desire to ask from whom has the Senator from California been quoting?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I have been quoting, I will say to the Senator from Nebraska, from the then Chancellor of the exchequer of the United Kingdom, Hon. Stanley Baldwin. who came here speaking for his country.

Mr. NORRIS. What was the date of that utterance? Mr. SHORTRIDGE. That statement of Stanley Baldwin was made in this city on Monday, January 8, 1923.

Mr. NORRIS. That was when he had come over here to agree upon a settlement?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. And it was that mission that brought about the settlement?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE.

Mr. NORRIS. I have interrupted the Senator mainly because I want to emphasize just what the Senator is saying; and I wish every citizen of the United States could read the statement the Senator has just read to us.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Let me, then, for the purpose of emphasizing what the Senator has just said and what I have just said particularly to point out that the then Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Stanley Baldwin, authorized to speak for his country, emphasized that it was a commercial transaction, and, as will appear a little later on, not a political transaction but a pure business transaction, and that it was followed by entering into what he and others and all considered and characterized as business, commercial contracts. To repeat, he expressed the hope that he would not be disappointed in arriving at a fair settlement of this business transaction as to the amount and as to the time of payment, for indeed, Mr. President, those, in a sense, were the two outstanding items to be considered, namely, first, "what was the amount we owe you?" secondly, "when shall it be paid?" I say that the honorable Chancellor of the Exchequer was not disappointed, for, after full and free discussion an agreement for the funding of the debt of the United Kingdom to the United States was entered into. Under that agreement, which will appear fully hereafter, Great Britain agreed-and I am quoting from the agreement-

Great Britain is indebted to the United States as of December 15, 1922, upon demand obligations in the principal amount of $4,074,818,358.44, not including obligations in the principal amount of $61,000,000, representing advances deemed to have been made to cover purchases of silver under the act of Congress approved April 23, 1918, of which $30,500,000 has been repaid in April and May, 1923, and the balance is to be repaid in 1924, pursuant to an agreement already made between the parties, and Great Britain is further indebted to the United States, as of December 15, 1922, on account of interest accrued from April 15, and May 15, 1919, on said $4,074,818,358.44, principal amount of demand obligations.

To the end that Senators, who will hereafter of course necessarily consider this problem, may have the agreement before them. I ask that the agreement entered into by and between the United States of America and the United Kingdom, spoken of throughout the agreement as Britain," may appear as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GRAMMER in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The agreement referred to is as follows:

PROPOSAL DATED THE 18TH DAY OF JUNE, 1923, BY HIS BRITTANIC MAJESTY'S GOVERNMENT (HEREINAFTER CALLED GREAT BRITAIN) TO THE GOVERNMENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA (HEREIN-FTER CALLED THE UNITED STATES) REGARDING THE FUNDING OF THE DEBT OF GREAT BRITAIN TO THE UNITED STATES

Whereas Great Britain is indebted to the United States as of 15th December, 1922, upon demand obligations in the principal amount of $4,074,818,358.44, not including obligations in the prinamount of $4,074,818,358.44, not including obligations in the principal amount of $61,000,000, representing advances deemed to have been made to cover purchases of silver under the act of Congress approved 23d April, 1918, of which $30,500,000 has been repaid in April and May, 1923, and the balance is to be repaid in 1924, pursuant to an agreement already made between the parties, and Great Britain is further indebted to the United States, as of 15th December, 1922, on account of interest accrued from 15th April and 15th May, 1919, on said $4,074,818,358.44, principal amount of demand obligations:

And whereas Great Britain has power under the war loan act, 1919 (9 and 10 Geo. 5, cap 37), to issue securities in exchange for maturing securities issued under the war loan acts, 1914 to

And whereas the demand obligations now held by the United States Treasury were so issued, and will become payable upon the request of the United States Treasury for their payment:

Now therefore Great Britain proposes, in the exercise of the powers above recited and in consideration and in faith of the statements, conditions, premises and mutual covenants herein contained, to issue to the United States, in exchange for the demand obligations now held by the United States Treasury, securities which shall be in their terms and conditions in accordance with the following provisions:

1. AMOUNT OF INDEBTEDNESS

The total amount of indebtedness to be funded is $4,600,000,000, which has been computed as follows:

The securities, which it is proposed to issue at par as promptly as possible, shall be obligations in the principal amount of $4,600,000,000, in the form of bonds to be dated 15th December, 1922, maturing 15th December, 1984, with interest payable semi-annually on 15th June and 15th December in each year at the rate of 3 per cent per annum from 15th December, 1922, to 15th December, 1932, and thereafter at the rate of 3½ per cent per annum until the principal thereof shall have been repaid.

3. METHOD OF PAYMENT

3. METHOD OF PAYMENT

The bonds shall be payable as to both principal and interest in United States gold coin of the present standard of weight and fineness, or its equivalent in gold bullion, or, at the option of Great Britain, upon not less than 30 days' advance notice indicating the minimum amount which it is contemplated to pay at next due date in gold, cash or available funds, in any bonds of the United States issued or to be issued after 6th April, 1917, to be taken at par and accrued interest to the date of payment hereunder: Provided, however, That Great Britain may at its option, upon not less than 90 days' advance notice, pay up to one-half of any interest accruing between 15th December, 1922, and 15th December, 1927, on any British bonds proposed to be issued hereunder, in bonds of Great Britain, maturing 15th December, 1984, dated and bearing interest from the respective dates when the interest to be paid thereby becomes due and substantially similar in other respects to the original bonds proposed to be issued hereunder. e issued hereunder.

All payments to be made by Great Britain on account of the principal or interest of any bonds proposed to be issued hereunder shall be made at the Treasury of the United States in Washington or, at the option of the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, at the Federal Reserve Bank of New York and, if in cash, shall be made at the option of Great Britain in gold coin of the United States or in gold bullion or in immediately available funds (or, if in bonds of the United States, shall be in form acceptable to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States). Appropriate notation of all payments on account of principal shall be made on the bonds proposed to be issued hereunder which may be held by the United States: Provided, however, That all payments in respect of any marketable obligations issued That all payments in respect of any marketable obligations issued under paragraph 9 of this proposal shall be made at the office of the fiscal agents of the British Government in the city of New York.

4. EXEMPTION FROM TAXATION

The principal and interest of all bonds issued or to be issued hereunder shall be exempt from all British taxation, present or future, so long as they are in the beneficial ownership of the United States or of a person, firm, association, or corporation neither domiciled nor ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom.

5. FORM OF BONDS

All bonds proposed to be issued hereunder to the United States shall be payable to the United States of America, or order, shall be issued, so far as possible, in denominations of $4,600,000 each, and shall be substantially in the form set forth in the exhibit annexed hereto, and marked "Exhibit A." The bonds shall be signed for Great Britain by the Counsellor of His Britannic Majesty's Embassy at Washington.

6. REPAYMENT OF PRINCIPAL

Provided, however, That Great Britain may at its option, upon not less than 90 days' advance notice, postpone any payment of principal falling due as hereinbefore provided to any subsequent June 15 or December 15, not more than two years distant from its due date, but only on condition that, if Great Britain shall at any time exercise this option as to any payment of principal, the payment falling due in the next succeeding year can not be postponed to any date more than one year distant from the date when it becomes due, unless and until the payment previously postponed shall actually have been made, and the payment falling due in the second succeeding year can not be postponed at all unless and until the payment of principal due two years previous thereto shall actually have been made.

In the event of Great Britain issuing bonds to the United States Provided, however, That Great Britain may at its option, upon

In the event of Great Britain issuing bonds to the United States in payment of interest accruing between December 15, 1922, and December 15, 1927, as proposed in paragraph 3 above, the bonds so issued shall contain provision for the payment of their principal before maturity through annual instalments on account of principal corresponding substantially to the schedule of payments on account of principal appearing in the table hereinabove set forth.

7. PAYMENTS BEFORE MATURITY

Great Britain may at its option, on any interest date or dates upon not less than 90 days' advance notice, make advance payments of principal, in addition to the payments required to be made by the provisions of the bonds in accordance with paragraph 6 of this proposal. Any such additional payments shall first be applied to the principal of any bonds which shall have been issued hereunder on account of interest accruing between December 15, 1922, and December 15, 1927, and then to the principal of any other bonds which shall have been issued hereunder. Any payments made to the United States under this provision shall be in amounts of $1,000,000 or multiples thereof.

R. CALCULATION OF INTEREST

Notwithstanding anything herein contained, the interest payable from time to time on the bonds proposed to be issued shall be computed on the amount of the principal outstanding on the previous interest date, with adjustments in respect of any payment on account of principal which may have been made since the previous interest date

9. EXCHANGE FOR MARKETABLE OBLIGATIONS

9. EXCHANGE FOR MARKETABLE OBLIGATIONS

Great Britain will issue to the United States at any time or from time to time, at the request of the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, in exchange for any or all of the bonds proposed to be issued hereunder and held by the United States, definitive engraved bonds in form suitable for sale to the public, in such amounts and denominations as the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States may request, in bearer form, with provision for registration as to principal, and/or in fully registered form, and otherwise on the same terms and conditions, as to dates of issue and maturity, rate or rates of interest, exemption from taxation, payment in bonds of the United States issued or to be issued after April 6, 1917, payment before maturity, and the like, as the bonds surrendered on such exchange, except that the bonds shall carry such provision for repayment of principal as shall be agreed upon; provided that, if no agreement to the contrary is arrived at, any such bonds shall contain separate provision for payments before maturity, conforming substantially to the table of repayments of principal prescribed by paragraph 6 of this proposal and in form satisfactory to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, such payments to be computed on a basis to accomplish the retirement of any such bonds by December 15, 1984, and to be made through annual drawings for redemption at par and accrued interest. Any payments of principal thus made before maturity on any such bonds shall be deducted from the payments required to be made by Great Britain to the United States in the corresponding years under the terms of the table of repayments of principal prescribed in paragraph 6 of this proposal.

the payments required to be made by Great Britain to the United States in the corresponding years under the terms of the table of repayments of principal prescribed in paragraph 6 of this proposal. Great Britain will deliver definitive engraved bonds to the United States in accordance herewith within six months of receiving notice of any such request from the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, and pending the delivery of the definitive engraved bonds, will, at the request of the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, deliver temporary bonds or interim receipts in a form to be agreed upon within three months of the receipt of such request. The United States, before offering any such bonds or interim receipts for sale in Great Britain, will first offer them to Great Britain for purchase at par and accrued first offer them to Great Britain for purchase at par and accrued interest, and Great Britain shall likewise have the option, in lieu of issuing to the United States any such bonds or interim receipts, to make advance redemption, at par and accrued interest, of a corresponding amount of bonds issued hereunder and held by the

United States

10. CANCELLATION AND SURRENDER OF DEMAND OBLIGATIONS

Upon the delivery to the United States of the $4,600,000,000 principal amount of bonds proposed to be issued hereunder, the United States will cancel and surrender to Great Britain, through the British ambassador at Washington or his representative, at the Treasury of the United States in Washington, the demand obligations of Great Britain in the principal amount of $4,074,-818,358.44 described in the preamble to this proposal.

Any notice, request, or consent under the hand of the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States shall be deemed and taken as the notice, request, or consent of the United States, and shall be sufficient if delivered at the British Embassy at Washington or at the office of the Permanent Secretary of the British Treasury in London; and any notice, request, or election from or by Great Britain shall be sufficient if delivered to the American Embassy in London or to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States at the Treasury of the United States in Washington. The United States, in its discretion, may waive any notice required hereunder, but any such waiver shall be in writing and shall not extend to or affect any subsequent notice or impair any right of the United States to require notice hereunder. States to require notice hereunder.

Treasury, this 18th day of June, 1923.

A. Geddes,
His Britannic Majesty's Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary.

JUNE 19, 1923.

The right honorable, Sir Auckland Geddes, G. C. M. G., K. C. B., Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary,

The British Embassy, Washington, D. C.

My Dear Mr. Ambassador: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of June 18, 1923, transmitting the proposal dated the 18th day of June, 1923, by His Britannic Majesty's Government to the Government of the United States of America regarding the funding of the debt of Great Britain to the United States. This proposal is agreeable to the World War Foreign Debt Commission, and I am writing for the commission and by its authority to advise you that the proposal is hereby accepted on behalf of the United States of America, pursuant to the authority conferred by the act of Congress approved February 9, 1922, as behalf of the United States of America, pursuant to the authority conferred by the act of Congress approved February 9, 1922, as amended by the act of Congress approved February 28, 1923. In accordance therewith I am writing to ask that the bonds as contemplated thereby may be delivered as soon as possible to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States in exchange for the demand obligations amounting to $4,074,818,358.44 now held by this properties now possible. by him which are otherwise now payable. Very truly yours,

A. W. MELLON, Secretary of the Treasury, and Chairman of the World War Foreign Debt Commission.

Approved:

WARREN G. HARDING, President.

JUNE 19, 1923.

FINLAND

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. On May 1, 1923, an agreement for the funding of the debt of Finland to the United States was entered into. Finland agrees that its indebtedness to the United States as of December 15, 1922, upon obligations maturing June 30, 1931, in the aggregate principal amount of $8,281,926.17, together with interest accrued and unpaid thereon, and that the amount of indebtedness to the United States to be funded after allowing for cash payments made or to be made by Finland is $9,000,000.

HUNGARY

On April 25, 1924, an agreement for the funding of the debt of Hungary to the United States was entered into. Hungary agrees that its indebtedness to the United States as of December 15, 1923, upon an obligation maturing January 1, 1925, was in the principal amount of $1,685,835.61, together with interest accrued and unpaid thereon, and that the amount of indebtedness to the United States to be funded, after allowing for cash payments made or to be made by Hungary, is $1,939,000.

LITHUANIA

On September 22, 1924, an agreement for the funding of the debt of Lithuania to the United States was entered into. Lithuania agrees that she was then indebted to the United States as of June 15, 1924, upon obligations maturing June 30, 1921-22, in the aggregate principal amount of $4,989,-628.03, together with interest accrued and unpaid thereon, and that the amount of indebtedness to be funded after allowing for cash payments made or to be made by Lithuania is $6,030,000.

On November 14, 1924, an agreement for the funding of the debt of Poland to the United States was entered into. No man who knows the history of Poland would expect that that country would repudiate its agreement, for we have not forgotten Kosciusko. Poland agrees that she was indebted to the United States as of December 15, 1922, upon obligations maturing in the aggregate principal amount of $159,666,972.39, together with interest accrued and unpaid thereon, and that the indebtedness to be funded after allowing for cash payments made or to be made by Poland is $178,560,000.

BELGITTM

On August 18, 1925, an agreement for the funding of the debt of Belgium to the United States was entered into. Belgium agrees that she was indebted to the United States as of June 15, 1925, upon obligations in the aggregate principal amount of $377,029,570.06, together with interest accrued and unpaid thereon, and that its indebtedness to the United States, both principal and interest, was to be funded through the issue of bonds to the United States; that the amount of the prearmistice indebtedness was $171,780,000, which is the principal amount of the obligations of Belgium received by the United States for cash advances made prior to November 11, 1918; that the amount of postarmistice indebtedness to be funded after allowing for certain cash payments made or to be made was $246,000,000.

T.ATVTA

On September 24, 1925, an agreement for the funding of the debt of Latvia to the United States was entered into. Latvia agrees that she was indebted to the United States as of December 15, 1922, upon obligations in the aggregate principal amount of $5,132,287.14, together with interest accrued and unpaid thereon, and that the indebtedness to be funded was $5,775,000.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA

On October 13, 1925, an agreement for the funding of the debt of Czechoslovakia to the United States was entered into. Czechoslovakia agrees that the amount of its indebtedness to the United States as of June 15, 1925, was $115,000,000 and that it "issue to the United States at par bonds of Czechoslovakia in the aggregate principal amount of $185,071,023.07, dated June 15, 1925."

ESTONIA

On the 28th day of October, 1925, an agreement for the funding of the debt of Estonia to the United States was entered into. Estonia agrees that it was indebted to the United States as of December 15, 1922, upon obligations in the aggregate principal amount of $13,999,145.60, together with interest accrued and unpaid thereon, and that the amount of indebtedness to be funded after allowing for cash payments made or to be made was $13,830,000.

On November 14, 1925, an agreement for the funding of the debt of Italy to the United States was entered into. Italy agrees that it was indebted to the United States as of June 15, 1925, upon obligations in the aggregate principal amount of $1,647,869,197.96, together with interest accrued and unpaid thereon, and that the indebtedness to be funded after allowing for certain cash payments made or to be made by Italy was $2,042,000,000.

On December 4, 1925, an agreement for the funding of the debt of Rumania to the United States was entered into. Rumania agrees that it was indebted to the United States as of June 15, 1925, upon obligations in the aggregate principal amount of $36,128,494.94, together with interest accrued and unpaid thereon, and that the amount of indebtedness to be funded after allowing for cash payments made or to be made by Rumania was $44,590,000.

FRANCE

On April 29, 1926, an agreement for the funding of the debt of France to the United States was entered into. France agrees that it was indebted to the United States as of June 15, 1925, upon obligations in the aggregate principal amount of $3,340,516,043.72, together with interest | accrued and unpaid thereon, and that the amount of indebtedness to be funded after allowing for certain cash payments made or to be made by France was $4,025,000,000. We entered into this agreement with France, as I have stated, on April 29, 1926; and after long discussion and concessions and generosity that went beyond all bounds we arrived at a balance, and France admitted that she owed us and agreed to pay us $4,025,000,000.

I call attention to, and ask to have inserted as a part of my remarks, the extraordinarily generous terms we gave to France in the matter of interest, as well as the long period given her in which to pay.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so

The matter referred to is as follows:

Form of bond: All bonds issued or to be issued hereunder to the United States shall be payable to the Government of the United States of America, or order, and shall be signed for France by its ambassador at Washington, or by its other duly authorized representative. The bonds shall be substantially in the form set forth in the exhibit hereto annexed and marked "Exhibit A," and shall be issued in 62 pieces with maturities and in denominations as hereinabove set forth and shall bear no interest until June 15, 1930, and thereafter shall bear interest at the rate of 1 per cent per annum from June 15, 1930, to June 15, 1940; at the rate of 2 per cent per annum from June 15, 1940, to June 15, 1950; at the rate of 2½ per cent per annum from June 15, 1950; to June 15, 1958; at the rate of 3 per cent per annum from June 15, 1958, to June 15, 1965, and at the rate of 3½ per cent per annum after June 15, 1965, all payable semiannually on June 15 and December 15 of each year.

KINGDOM OF THE SERRE CROATE AND CONTRACT Form of bond: All bonds issued or to be issued hereunder to the

KINGDOM OF THE SERBS, CROATS, AND SLOVENES

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. On May 3, 1926, an agreement for the funding of the debt of the Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes to the United States was entered into. The Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes agrees that it was indebted to the United States as of June 15, 1925, under obligations in the aggregate principal amount of $51,037,-886.39, together with interest accrued and unpaid thereon, and that the amount of indebtedness to be funded after allowing for certain cash payments made or to be made by the Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes was $62,855,000.

AUSTRIA, GREECE, AND GERMANY

Separate agreements were entered into with Austria, Greece, and Germany, copies of which and detailed information concerning them may be found in the annual reports of the Secretary of the Treasury on the state of the finances for fiscal years ending June 30, 1932.

In the agreement with Great Britain, and in each of these several agreements, it is provided that bonds to be issued by those debtor nations-and I want this country to bear this in mind, and I want these debtor nations to bear it in mind-in these agreements, in each and every one of them, it is provided that bonds to be issued by the debtor nations shall be payable, as to both principal and interest, in United States gold coin of the present standard of value, or-which was a generous but a wise provision-at the option of the debtor nations, upon not less than 30 days' advance notice to the United States, in any bonds of the United States issued or to be issued after April 16, 1917, to be taken at par and accrued interest to the date of the payment.

I am sure Senators grasp the signifinance of that bond reference. These bonds, to be issued by the foreign governments and delivered to us, were payable in United States gold coin of the then present standard value; or they could be paid by way of delivery to us of our bonds, which we agreed to accept at par and accrued interest to the very hour of delivery of the bonds and payment of the debt.

By these several agreements each of these debtor nations was given 62 years-62 years!-in which to pay its acknowledged indebtedness to the United States; and the average rate of interest to be paid is far less than the normal rate on private indebtedness.

Let it be remembered, let ambassadors and ministers plenipoteniary remember, let these debtor nations remember, and let those who speak for our country remember that we held demand obligations, demands immediately payable; but we gave to each and every of these debtor nations 62 years in which to pay, and at rates of interest far less than interest rates in private, ordinary business transactions.

In reaching agreements with Great Britain, for example, and with the other nations, we took account of their capacity to pay. I trust that that phrase will strike the minds of negotiators. As of then, when entering into these agreements, we took into account their capacity to pay. Hence, the long period of 62 years granted within which to pay. We misrepresented nothing. We concealed nothing. We did not threaten. We did not intimidate. We did not coerce, or attempt to coerce. We cordially agreed with the Chancellor of the Exchequer of Great Britain when he said:

Our wish is to approach the discussion as business men seeking a business solution of what is fundamentally a business problem.

And the "two greatest democracies of the world" proceeded, in the spirit suggested by him, to discuss the problem, and arrived at agreement as to the indebtedness of Great Britain to the United States.

We proceeded in like spirit to discuss with other particular countries the problem of their indebtedness to us, and reached agreements with them; and I further add that we dealt with these debtor nations not collectively but separately. Thereafter these agreements were approved, confirmed, by appropriate action by the United States and by the debtor nations, each in its individual character as a separate, independent, sovereign nation.

So much for these agreements in writing, voluntarily entered into, without misrepresentation, without concealment, without attempt to coerce, with no intimidation, but freely and voluntarily entered into between civilized and presumably honorable nations.

I now invite attention to the moratorium agreements.

Later, in 1932, we entered into written agreements with these debtor nations whereby payments of certain amounts payable to us during the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1931, and ending June 30, 1932, in respect of their bonded indebt-edness, were postponed. The moratorium agreement with Great Britain is as follows:

I ask that that agreement be inserted in the RECORD. The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Austin in the chair). Without objection, that order will be made.

The matter referred to is as follows:

AGREEMENT MADE THE 4TH DAY OF JUNE, 1932, AT THE CITY OF WASHINGTON, D. C., BETWEEN THE GOVERNMENT OF THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND NORTHERN IRELAND, HEREINAFTER CALLED THE GOVERNMENT OF THE UNITED KINGDOM, PARTY OF THE FIRST PART, AND THE GOVERNMENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICAN ICA, HEREINAPTER CALLED THE UNITED STATES, PARTY OF THE SECOND PART

Whereas under the terms of the debt-funding agreement be-Whereas under the terms of the debt-funding agreement between the Government of the United Kingdom and the United States, dated June 19, 1923, there is payable by Great Britain to the United States during the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1931, and ending June 30, 1932, in respect of the bonded indebtedness of the Government of the United Kingdom to the United States, the aggregate amount of $159,520,000, including principal and

Whereas a joint resolution of the Congress of the United States, approved December 23, 1931, authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, to make on behalf of the United States an agreement with the Government of the United Kingdom on the terms hereinafter set forth, to postpone the payment of the amount payable by the Government of the United Kingdom to the United States during such year in respect of its bonded indebtedness to the United States; and

Whereas the Government of the United Kingdom hereby gives assurance, to the satisfaction of the President of the United States, of its willingness and readiness to make with the government of each foreign country indebted to the Government of the United Kingdom in respect of war, relief, or reparation debts, an agreement in respect to the payment of the amount or amounts payable to the Government of the United Kingdom with respect to such debt or debts during such fiscal year, substantially similar to this agreement authorized by the joint resolution above mentioned; now, therefore, in consideration of the premises and of the mutual covenants herein contained, it is agreed as follows:

1. Payment of the amount of $159,520,000, payable by the Gov-1. Payment of the amount of $159,520,000, payable by the Government of the United Kingdom to the United States during the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1931, and ending June 30, 1932, in respect of the bonded indebtedness of the Government of the United Kingdom to the United States, according to the terms of the agreement of June 19, 1923, above mentioned, is hereby postponed so that such amount together with interest thereon at the rate of 4 per cent per annum from July 1, 1933, shall be paid by the Government of the United Kingdom to the United States in 10 equal annuities of $19,441,530.10 each, payable in equal semiannual installments on December 15 and June 15 of each fiscal year beginning with the fiscal year July 1, 1933, and ending June 30, 1934, and concluding with the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1942, and ending June 30, 1943.

2. Except so far as otherwise expressly provided in this agreement, payments of annuities under this agreement shall be subject to the same terms and conditions as payments under the agreement of June 19, 1923, above mentioned. The proviso in paragraph 6 of such agreement, authorizing the postponement of payments on account of principal, and the option of the Government of the United Kingdom provided for in paragraph 3, to pay in obligations of the United States, shall not apply to annuities payable under this agreement.

3. The agreement of June 19, 1923, between the Government of the United Kingdom and the United States, above mentioned, shall remain in all respects in full force and effect except so far as expressly modified by this agreement.

4. The Government of the United Kingdom and the United States each for itself represents and agrees that the execution and delivery of this agreement have in all respects been duly authorized and that all acts, conditions, and legal formalities which should have been completed prior to the making of this agreement have been completed as required by the laws of the United Kingdom and the United States, respectively, and in conformity therewith.

5. This agreement shall be executed in two counterparts, each

Sir Ronald Lindsay, ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary at Washington, thereunto duly authorized, and the United States has likewise caused this agreement to be executed. cuted on its behalf by the Hon. Ogden L. Mills, Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, pursuant to a joint resolution of Congress, approved December 23, 1931, all on the day and year first above written.

The Government of the United Kingdom:

By R. C. LINDSAY, Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary. The United States of America:

By OGDEN L. MILLS, Secretary of the Treasury.

Approved.

HERBERT HOOVER, President.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Like moratorium agreements were entered into with the different other debtor nations; and these moratorium agreements were authorized by our Joint Resolution 147, approved December 23, 1931. I ask that that Joint Resolution No. 147 be incorporated in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that order will be made.

The joint resolution is as follows:

[Public Resolution No. 5, Seventy-second Congress] House Joint Resolution 147

Joint resolution to authorize the postponement of amounts payable to the United States from foreign governments during the fiscal year 1932, and their repayment over a 10-year period beginning July 1, 1933

beginning July 1, 1933

Resolved, etc., That in the case of each of the following countries: Austria, Belgium, Czechoslovakia, Estonia, Finland, France, Germany, Great Britain, Greece, Hungary, Italy, Latvia, Lithuania, Poland, Rumania, and Yugoslavia, the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, is authorized to make, on behalf of the United States, an agreement with the Government of such country to postpone the payment of any amount payable during the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1931, by such country to the United States in respect of its bonded indebtedness to the United States, except that in the case of Germany the agreement shall relate only to amounts payable by Germany to the United States during such fiscal year in respect of the costs of the army of occupation.

States during such iscal year in respect of the costs of the army of occupation.

SEC. 2. Each such agreement on behalf of the United States shall provide for the payment of the postponed amounts, with interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum beginning July 1, 1933, in 10 equal annuities, the first to be paid during the fiscal years following, each annuity to be payable in one or more installments. ments.

SEC. 3. No such agreement shall be made with the government SEC. 3. No such agreement shall be made with the government of any country unless it appears to the satisfaction of the President that such government has made, or has given satisfactory assurances of willingness and readiness to make, with the government of each of the other countries indebted to such country in respect of war, relief, or reparation debts, an agreement in respect of such debt substantially similar to the agreement authorized by this joint resolution to be made with the government of such creditor country on behalf of the United States.

SEC. 4. Each agreement authorized by this joint resolution shall be made so that payments of annuities under such agreement shall, unless otherwise provided in the agreement, (1) be in accordance with the provisions contained in the agreement made cordance with the provisions contained in the agreement made with the government of such country under which the payments to be postponed is payable, and (2) be subject to the same terms and conditions as payments under such original agreement.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. It will be noted that this agreement with Great Britain contains this provision:

Whereas the Government of the United Kingdom hereby gives assurance, to the satisfaction of the President of the United States, of its willingness and readiness to make with the government of each foreign country indebted to the Government of the United Kingdom in respect of war, relief, or reparation debts, an agreement in respect to the payment of the amount or amounts payable to the Government of the United Kingdom with respect to such debt or debts during such fiscal year, substantially similar to this correspond to the control of the United Kingdom with respect to such debt or debts during such fiscal year, substantially similar to the correspond to the control of the United Kingdom with respect to such debt or debts during such fiscal year, substantially similar to the control of the United Kingdom with respect to such debt or debts during such fiscal year. lar to this agreement authorized by the joint resolution above mentioned.

I repeat, a like provision is in the agreements with such other of our debtor nations as held claims or had agreements with any foreign country in respect of war, relief, or reparation debts.

It is scarcely necessary for me to remind the Senate that such a provision in the moratorium agreements was considered of prime and controlling importance by our Government. I could enlarge upon that, but I am relying greatly on the knowledge of the Senate by refraining from doing so. Moreover, I do not wish to take up the time of the Senate to explain what I say here briefly, that this provision in the moratorium agreement was considered of vital, controlling importance by the Government of the United States.

Thus, then, the matter stood, and thus the matter stands. We entered into these agreements with these nations, and these agreements were and are valid and binding in law and in equity on the contracting parties, binding upon us, binding upon them. Agreements in writing, voluntarily entered into, exist as between us and these several debtor nations

As was well said by then Representative, now Senator HULL, our coming Secretary of State, before the House Ways and Means Committee:

When the peace convention was being held, there was not a word said publicly about any question as to the absolute validity of these debts by any government. They were all entered into freely and voluntarily as the portion that each government should contribute in connection with the war, and the debts were considered as commercial and not as political debts.

I have no information and no definite opinion as to what our coming Secretary of State will say or be willing to advise in respect of these existing contracts, but I am very sure he will not forget that as of then, as a Representative in the House, he characterized these debts as "commercial and not as political debts."

I assume that everyone who understands the English language and is at all familiar with communications between nations grasps the different meaning existing between a commercial debt and a political debt. They were considered and treated as commercial debts, expressly so termed by the then Chancellor of the Exchequer, and expressly so characterized by Mr. Hull, our coming Secretary of State. Whether they so characterize them or not, I know that they were purely commercial debts. These commercial debts grew out of the fact that we furnished supplies and advanced money to and for these debtor nations prior to and subsequent to the armistice amounting to the vast sum which I have stated.

Mr. President, this must not be overlooked. These agreements were entered into separately with these nations, not collectively; and I trust that our Government will insist upon it that they were and are agreements entered into separately, in a sense individually, with these different debtor nations. Much might be said as to the importance of that fact, but I do not enlarge upon it.

Would it be contended, Mr. President, by any intelligent man, that if a like agreement had been entered into by individuals, either party could have the agreement set aside, declared void or invalid, or be relieved of his legal and moral obligations thereunder by a court of equity in any civilized country in the world? Let me read again what the then Chancellor of the Exchequer said concerning us, the United States, as of the time when we were entering into the adjustment of the existing debt presently due us from the United Kingdom. Said Mr. Baldwin:

"The generosity of America is proverbial," said the Hon. Stanley Baldwin, M. P., Chancellor of the Exchequer, "but we are not here to ask for favors or to impose on generosity. We want, on such terms as will produce the least possible disturbance in the trade relations of the two countries, a fair business settlement, a square deal, a settlement that will secure for America the repayment to the last cent of those credits which the United States Government established in America for us, their associates in the war. Our wish is to approach the discussion as business men seeking a business solution of what is fundamentally a business problem."

Mr. President, it is but just to recall and remind these debtor nations that in order to be able to lend them these great amounts and to furnish them supplies during and after the war, it was necessary for us, the United States, to issue our interest-bearing bonds, many billions of which are in the hands of our own people or held abroad. In order to furnish supplies, in order to advance cash, it became necessary for us to borrow the money with which to accommodate these nations, and in order to get that money we issued our interest-bearing bonds, and billions of those bonds are outstanding in the hands of our own people or are held

I repeat myself to remind Senators that the agreements between these several nations provide that the bonds which they issued to us are payable in United States gold coin of the then present standard of value, or may be paid by the delivery to us of our outstanding bonds, which we agree to accept at par and with accrued interest.

It should be remembered that we, too, are heavily burdened, that we, too, have obligations to be met and discharged, that we too, are suffering. But does anybody at home or abroad hear of our repudiating any of our outstanding obligations? Does anybody hear Uncle Sam asking for cancellation of any of his outstanding obligations, whether held at home or held abroad? Has anybody heard of our defaulting in the payment of principal or interest on any of our outstanding obligations?

Mr. President, I venture to suggest this day that our rights under these contracts may be jeopardized by considering them along with other subjects, such as depreciated currencies, foreign trade, tariffs, exchange of goods, or other unrelated subjects. The debts due and to become due us are payable in gold, not in goods, not in paper, not in promises. They are payable in gold of fixed standard value, and we should insist that they should be and must be paid according to agreement.

These commercial debts should not be exchanged for chimerical benefits of free trade. I hope it will not be considered provocative of present discussion for me to repeat that these commercial debts due us, and to become due, should not be exchanged or traded for what I call chimerical benefits of free trade.

Of course, I do not walk under the political banner of our next President. He has not sought or asked, and will not seek or ask, my advice in regard to these foreign-nation debts. But I am deeply interested in the subject matter, and I trust he will not deem me presumptuous or consider me offensive when I express the hope that in any discussion with these debtor nations concerning these debts, he, or those speaking for him, will be as patient as Lincoln, but as firm as Andrew Jackson—patient, but firm; patient as Lincoln in listening, in giving respectful consideration, but as firm as "Old Hickory" in insisting that France and Great Britain and Italy, and other debtor nations, shall pay what they voluntarily agreed to pay, and pay according to the generous agreements voluntarily by us entered into with them.

Mr. President, the President elect, soon to assume the helm, knows, of course, the views of his countrymen as to the cancellation or reduction of these debts, as those views were authoritatively declared by their Representatives in Senate and House, and I assume that he will pay respectful heed and give consideration to those views as they were then Chancellor of the Exchequer said concerning us, the expressed in Resolution 147 authorizing the foreign-debts United States, as of the time when we were entering into moratorium. Section 5 of that resolution reads as follows:

SEC. 5. It is hereby expressly declared to be against the policy of Congress that any of the indebtedness of foreign countries to the United States should be in any manner canceled or reduced; and nothing in this joint resolution shall be construed as indicating a contrary policy, or as implying that favorable consideration will be given at any time to a change in the policy hereby declared.

May I add that I thought then, and I continue to think, that that policy was wise, that it was just, wise and just to us and wise and just toward those debtor nations. I indulge myself in the hope that that policy will not be abandoned or departed from. I shall not be here to assist in upholding it, but I think I am warranted in believing that there will be a Senate here, quite regardless of party distinction, a Senate made up of 96 patriotic, intelligent, vigilant American Senators, who will stand firm toward the carrying out of the policy this Congress has heretofore declared, as we find it in our Joint Resolution 147.

I know full well there will be artful arguments by foreign diplomats and, perhaps, by American internationalists to the effect that a cancellation or a material reduction of these debts will go far to improving our economic condition. Such arguments are utterly fallacious. They will be urged by debtor nations for their, not for our, relief and benefit.

The old argument of capacity to pay will be urged again. Capacity to pay? We gave due and generous consideration to that argument when the funding agreements were entered into, giving these debtor nations 62 years to pay the several sums then presently due. We again gave consideration to that argument when, by way of the moratorium agreements, we relieved these debtor nations from certain payments due or to become due under the parent funding agreements.

It is not a lack of capacity to pay but rather a disinclination to pay that will renew this old argument. Not one of these debtor nations dares to stand before the world and claim that it is bankrupt. Not one of them dares to say to-day that it is insolvent. I am well aware that there is no international court which has jurisdiction to relieve a debtor nation by way of bankruptcy proceedings; but if there were such a court, I repeat that there is not one of these debtor nations that would dare to file a petition in bankruptcy.

Ordinarily it would not be considered proper for us to advise foreign nations as to their internal or domestic affairs; but when these debtor nations come to us pleading to be relieved from legal and moral obligations and urge their incapacity to pay according to agreements, it is not improper or offensive for us to remind them that if they would but reduce their mighty armies and navies, and practice sensible economy in the administration of their affairs, they would be quite able to meet the payments due and to become due from them to the United States.

When in June, 1931, the President requested my views in regard to a proposed or suggested moratorium, I said that any such proposed postponement did not indicate and was not to be construed as any indication or intention or willingness on our part to agree to any further postponement, nor to a cancellation of any of the debts due or to become due us from debtor nations under existing and constitutionally ratified agreements by and between us and them. And, as I have pointed out by way of Resolution 147, the Congress took the same position.

Mr. President, I, of course, am speaking under much embarrassment. I realize the existing situation. I waited indeed for two or three days, not desiring to interfere with appropriation bills or conference reports. I can only hope that what I have indicated may attract the attention of those Senators who will be called upon to discuss the matter in the days to come. As for me, I recognize, as I trust we all do, that the existing agreements may not be cancelled, may not be modified, may not be amended or changed by an act of a President or the executive branch of our Government. They can only be changed by the action of the Congress in cooperation, it is true, with the executive department. As for me, to take leave of the subject, with malice for none, with charity for all of these nations, I think that our duty is to insist upon the policy heretofore declared and which means that we stand firmly upon agreements voluntarily and freely entered into between us and these several debtor nations. Wishing them peace and prosperity, our first, last, and continuing duty is to the people of the United States of America.

INVESTIGATION OF CONDITIONS ON BOULDER CANYON PROJECT

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, I submit a resolution which I think can be disposed of without any debate. I first ask that the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation be discharged from the further consideration of the resolution (S. Res. 293), which I introduced on December 7, 1932, providing for an investigation of conditions at Hoover Dam.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. ODDIE. I ask now that the resolution may be read. The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That a special committee of the Senate be appointed by the President of the Senate after March 4, 1933, three from the major political party and two from the minority political party, to be authorized and directed to investigate conditions existing in the Boulder Canyon project Federal reservation and the operations of the Six Companies (Inc.), and the officers of the Department of the Interior, with respect to the construction of Hoover Dam, and particularly with a view to ascertaining all facts relating to (1) the store operated by the Six Companies (Inc.), (2) contracts for the housing and feeding of employees of the Federal Government and the Six Companies (Inc.), and (3) the taxation of property and incomes within such reservation. The committee shall report to the Senate as soon as practicable the results of its investigations, together with its recommendations, if any, for necessary remedial legislation.

For the purposes of this resolution the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold such hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions and recesses of the Senate in the Seventy-third Congress until the final report is submitted, to employ such clerical and other assistants, to require by subpena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, and to make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $5,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I ask that the resolution may lie on the table for the present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will lie on the table.

ANNUAL REPORT OF GORGAS MEMORIAL LABORATORY

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, the annual report of the Gorgas Memorial Laboratory is required by law to be made to the Congress. The making of the report to the Congress has just been completed, and I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed as a Senate document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CALL OF THE ROLL

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas obtained the floor.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to enable me to suggest the absence of a quorum?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. I suggest the absence of a quorum. The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Caraway	Gore	McKellar
Austin	Carey	Grammer	McNary
Bailey	Clark	Harrison	Metcalf
Bankhead	Coolidge	Hastings	Moses

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-eight Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

TRIBUTE AND GIFT TO THE VICE PRESIDENT

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, after a service of 14 years in the House of Representatives, 20 years in the Senate, and 4 years as Vice President of the United States and ex officio Presiding Officer of this body, making a total of 38 years of honorable and efficient service to the Government, you are about to retire and take again your position in private life.

I have been requested by my fellow Senators to present to you an evidence of their esteem and affection. Every Member of this body has sought the privilege of contributing to a gift which is intended to be a lifelong reminder of the cordial relationships that exist between yourself and those with whom you have labored. On this gift, a beautiful and enduring token, are inscribed the names of all the Members of the Senate. There is at least one name among those suggestive of the services of a renowned and able representative of his State in the Senate of the United States who has passed away during the last few days, the late Senator Walsh of Montana.

In the period comprehended by the years to which reference has been made, we have seen marvelous changes come to our country and to all the world. Nations have risen and fallen; peoples have been drawn into the whirlpool of a combat that has affected the happiness and the safety, as well as the prosperity, of millions.

It would perhaps be inappropriate for me to attempt to tell you, sir, how often I have felt that you had been wrong when taking position in the House of Representatives and in the Senate contrary to that which I believed to be correct. Everyone who knows you admits, even declares, that always you have been prompted by a sense of patriotism, by a consciousness of duty.

The times through which we are now passing are filled with causes of anxiety and distress. When you leave the Senate to-morrow, at the expiration of your term of office as Vice President of the United States, you will carry with you the confidence, the respect, and the admiration of all the Members of this body; and we will express in this token, as well as in the words which we employ, our good wishes for your long-continued happiness and success.

I have referred to the distressing conditions which prevail in the country and throughout the world. Let me conclude with the lines of the poet, who said:

Take heart,
The waster builds again.
A charmed life
Old goodness hath,
The tares may perish,
But the grain is not for death!

God moves in all things; All obey his first propulsion. From the night Wake thou, and watch! The world is gray With morning light.

[Applause on the floor and in the galleries.]

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, the years are endless, but they have an end. This paradox carries another—the inseparable separations which the termination of years brings. Such an occasion now comes to us again, as it comes at the end of every Congress, at the end of every administration, and we would not have it pass without some indication, permanent and definite, of those feelings of intimacy and friendship and affection which grow up within the walls of this Chamber. Thus, Mr. President, as you come to the termination of a career constantly upward, constantly helpful, and constantly patriotic, those who have been associated with you can not omit to make it known tangibly that there is in our minds and in our hearts a feeling for you which we seek feebly to express by this gift.

We ask you to accept it, and to know that, while it bears upon its imperishable metal the name of each of us, it carries, not less imperishably, the affection which we feel for you. Of the group who go out with you to-morrow and the group who remain here afterwards all share alike that feeling which may be expressed in the lines of Mrs. Barbauld:

'Tis hard to part when friends are dear,—
Perhaps 'twill cost a sigh, a tear;
Then steal away, give little warning,
Choose thine own time;
Say not "Good-night" but in some brighter clime
Bid me "Good morning."

[Applause on the floor and in the galleries.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. Friends, I thank you from the bottom of my heart for the touching tributes and expressions of regard and for this beautiful gift. I shall treasure it always and pass it on with pride to my descendants, with the request and hope that it may always be retained in the Curtis family. I deeply appreciate the sentiment which prompted the engraving of the names on this exquisite remembrance; but I say to you that in my memory there shall always be inscribed equally indelibly the names of the many friends I have in the Senate of the United States. [Applause on the floor and in the galleries, Senators rising to their feet.]

COLUMBIA HISTORICAL SOCIETY OF WASHINGTON

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, as chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the United States Senate I ask permission to have printed in the Record an article appearing in the Records of the Columbia Historical Society of Washington, D. C., volume 20, pages 141 to 167, under date of May 16, 1916, by the late Mrs. Harriot Stoddert Turner, a distinguished and brilliant woman of Washington, D. C., and a granddaughter of Benjamin Stoddert, entitled "Memoirs of Benjamin Stoddert, First Secretary of the United States Navy."

The article contains much material of interest to our Navy and deals with the early development of our country and the city of Washington. Secretary Stoddert was a man of great ability and distinction. He was wounded in the Battle of Brandywine, in which he served as major in the Continental Army. He had much to do with the building of our Navy. He was a close friend of General Washington and one of the founders of the District of Columbia and the city of Washington. He was one of the original and large landowners here, inheriting large areas of land within the District from his grandfather, James Stoddert, who came to Maryland in 1650 from Scotland. Among the tracts of land owned by James Stoddert was one of over 3,000 acres which he and his friend, Col. John Addison, purchased together in 1718 and named "Friendship." Part of this tract is the present estate of Edward B. McLean, which still bears the name of "Friendship."

Benjamin Stoddert was Secretary of the Board of War under President John Adams, and in 1798 was appointed the first Secretary of the Navy by President John Adams, the great grandfather of the present Secretary of the Navy, Charles Francis Adams. He is, therefore, the only man who has held both offices of Secretary of War and Secretary of the Navy.

In 1781 Benjamin Stoddart married Rebecca Lowndes, daughter of Christopher Lowndes, of Bostock House, Md., whose mother was Elizabeth Tasker, of Belair, that famous old Colonial mansion on the Military Highway between Washington and Annapolis, the home of several of the old Governors of Maryland. The Lowndes and Tasker families were among the most prominent and distinguished in Maryland and were large landowners in the State, and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. Oddie] is directly descended from both families.

It is a matter of interest in connection with Benjamin Stoddert that his great grandson, United States Senator Tasker Lowndes Oddie, of Nevada, has been a member of the Naval Affairs Committee of the United States Senate for years past and has taken a deep interest in the affairs of the Navy. He has been a stanch advocate of a strong and effective Navy and has taken an active part in many battles for the Navy and appropriations therefor on the floor of the Senate and in the committees. He has fought constantly and hard for a larger and stronger Navy. Different members of his family for generations have been distinguished officers of the Navy, so Senator Oddie comes by his love for that branch of the service naturally and by inheritance. A prized possession of Senator Oddie is the old Lowestoft bowl, presented to Secretary Stoddert by the first officers of the Navy and bearing his initials.

I ask that the article may be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article is as follows:

MEMOIRS OF BENJAMIN STODDERT, FIRST SECRETARY OF THE UNITED STATES NAVY *

By Harriot Stoddert Turner, May 16, 1916

Oliver Wendell Holmes says that a child's education begins with that of his grandfather. James Stoddert, grandfather of Benjamin Stoddert, first Secretary of the United States Navy, was a Scotchman by birth, a man of education, and a surveyor by profession. He brought a wife with him to Maryland about 1650 and some means, which he invested in land, and settled near La Plata, where many Stoddert tombs still exist. "In 1718 he was appointed to survey and lay out Annapolis anew," and in the same year he and Col. John Addison together patented Friendship, a tract of 3,125 acres, part of which now belongs to the John R. McLean estate and still bears the quaint old name redolent of eighteenth century sentiment given it by its first patentees, Addison and Stoddert. It is now beautifully improved, and is yearly thrown open to some of the charitable societies of Washington, who give picturesque garden parties on the grounds. The "Friendship" between the Stoddert and Addison families which prompted the name still exists unbroken after nearly two hundred years—1718 to 1916.

stoddert and Addison lamines which prompted the name still exists unbroken after nearly two hundred years—1718 to 1916.

Thomas Stoddert, youngest son of the surveyor, inherited 1,200 acres of the original Falls Run tract from two of his brothers who died young. He married Sarah Marshall, daughter of "Thomas Marshall, Gentleman," of Marshall Hall, at present a well-known summer resort. They were the parents of Benjamin Stoddert. Family tradition says that Thomas Stoddert was captain in the British Army and killed in Braddock's defeat July 9, 1755, but on the 15th of September of that year Governor Sharpe, of Maryland, wrote to Calvert: "I have not heard that any enemy has been seen in this province since Col. Dunbar left us, but the people who lived beyond Tunalloway Creek, where Lieut. Stoddert and fitteen men have built a stoccado (stockade) Fort, have, I am informed, all left their plantations so that the country is deserted for 30 miles eastward of Col. Cresap's." Again on January 5, 1776, Sharpe writes to Calvert as follows, which shows that Stoddert was alive then: "In the mean time I support Captain Dagworthy's company at Fort Cumberland and Lieut. Stoddert's party at Tunalloway out of the money that was subscribed by the Gentlemen for that purpose. These parties, I believe, have been in great measure the Protection of our People while numbers of People in Pennsylvania have been cut off within Ten miles of our Forts. The government of that Province has at last accepted a bill for £55,000 to be struck in paper and sunck (sic) in four years."

vania have been cut oil within Ten miles of our Forts. The government of that Province has at last accepted a bill for £55,000 to be struck in paper and sunck (sic) in four years." The stockade at Tunalloway is referred to by the Maryland Gazette of that year when it says "Some men were scalped near Stoddert's Fort"—but the resolute pioneers at Fort Cumberland and Fort Stoddert, though small in number, stopped the advance of the French and Indians, and saved from devastation the beautiful valleys of the Cumberland and Shenandoah.

tiful valleys of the Cumberland and Shenandoah.

Benjamin Stoddert, the only son of Lieut. Thomas Stoddert and Sarah Marshall, was born in 1751 in Charles County. He had one sister, Sarah, who was the ancestress of the Matthews family of Georgetown. He appears to have been in Pennsylvania, possibly, as has been suggested, as a student at the University of Pennsylvania, as he enlisted in Captain Hartley's "Additional Continental Regiment of Cavalry" which was raised in Pennsylvania and which he joined on the 13th of January, 1777. When serving as Captain in it he was severely wounded and disabled at Brandywine, which wound he suffered from until the day of his death but refused a pension, as he was of the independent spirit of the patriots of the Revolution who felt able to support themselves and their families without help from a paternal government. In his later years he wrote a letter to John Templeman, of Georgetown, then in New England (this letter is now at the Congressional Library) in which he says: "Brought up a merchant the Revolutionary War commenced just as my apprenticeship ended. I entered the Army, after two or three years was made (in 1779) Secretary of the Board of War but before the War ended returned to Maryland to marry looking to commerce as the means by which

This explains why his name is not recorded in the Maryland Rosters but is found in the Pennsylvania archives.

I was to support a family." His appointment as Secretary of the Board of War, which the Journals of Congress say was unanimously made, threw him into close association with John Adams, who was president of that Board, and probably finally led to his selection by Adams as First Secretary of the United States Navy.

On June 7, 1781, a marriage license was issued at Marlboro, Prince George's County, to Benjamin C. Stoddert and Rebecca Lowndes, daughter of Christopher Lowndes of Bostock House, Maryland. It was about this time that some Federalists proposed to annex Canada—and young Stoddert's fervid Revolutionary patriotism made him call himself Benjamin Canada Stoddert, a name he afterwards dropped as easily as the project for the an-name he afterwards dropped as easily as the project for the annexation of Canada was ultimately dropped by the United States.

The Young Captain of the Rebel Army was drawn by his marriage into an atmosphere both monarchial and nautical. His father-in-law was an Englishman, "Christopher Lowndes, mer-chant," as Mrs. Ann (Bladen) Tasker called him in her will, which left to her four daughters and heirs, Mesdames Dulany, which left to her four daughters and heirs, Mesdames Dulany, Ogle, Lowndes, and Carter a fortune of £70,000. Mr. Lowndes was one of the founders of Bladensburg in 1746. It was named for his wife's uncle, Thomas Bladen, royal governor of Maryland in 1742, whose nephew, John Hawke, was the most famous English sailor of his time, 1705-1781. "As an admiral at sea—and on his own element, Hawke has had no superior." The mother of these Bladens was Lady Isabella Fairfax, of the same family as

Mr. Lowndes built ships on the Eastern Branch, which were floated down on that once important stream to Norfolk and thence to the West Indies. Councillor to Robert Carter, of Nomini, who married another of the Taskers, sent wheat in his own ships to Leghorn, Italy, and we have all read in Weem's Life of Washington

Married another of the laskers, sent wheat in his own ships to Leghorn, Italy, and we have all read in Weem's Life of Washington of the excellence of the flour made from wheat grown at Mount Vernon and shipped directly to foreign ports by General Washington, showing the existence then of a flourishing but small foreign trade on the Potomac and Chesapeake.

On May 7, 1755, Governor Sharpe wrote to General Braddock of Mr. Lowndes:

"Dear General: As I have been most earnestly solicited and importuned on my return to this place by one, Mr. Lowndes, a person whose Behavior and Conduct on all occasions make me very desirous of serving him, to apply to your Excellency and beg the Discharge of four Servants of his that were enlisted by H. Brereton just as he was leaving Rock Creek. He has a ship on the stocks which these servants were employed in building, fitting for sea. Others of the same trade cannot be procured, whereby the Vessel must remain unfinished and the Owner receive a prodigious Detriment unless by my intercession he can be favorably heard by your Excellency and procure the Servants' discharge. I have given him hopes of succeeding." (Brereton was a British Naval Lieutenant.)

ment unless by my intercession he can be favorably heard by your Excellency and procure the Servants' discharge. I have given him hopes of succeeding." (Brereton was a British Naval Lieutenant.)

This impressment of shipbuilders, who were probably slaves, shows that even before the Revolution the British officers did so many high-handed things that they finally forced on the Americans the war cry of 1812, "Freedom of the seas and sailors' rights."

An advertisement taken from the Maryland Gazette, Annapolis, March 15, 1764, reads as follows:

March 15, 1764, reads as follows:
"Wanted for the snow Apollo, Joseph Martin, master, for London, and now lying in the Eastern Branch of the Patowmack, Four don, and now lying in the Eastern Branch of the Patowmack, Four Able Seamen. For further Particulars enquire of the Master on board, or of Christopher Lowndes."

The snow Apollo is not, as might be imagined, an image of the Greek god sculptured in snow, but is, according to the Century Dictionary, a vessel of peculiar rigging which is no longer used.

Mr. Stoddert became in 1783 a shipping merchant in Georgetown and a member of the firm of Forrest, Stoddert & Murdock, which established branch houses in London and Bordeaux. He built a spacious colonial house on Prospect and Frederick (now built a spacious colonial house on Prospect and Frederick (now Thirty-fourth) Streets, which up to a few years ago (except for the addition of an incongruous bay window) remained unchanged, but is now much altered. The name of Prospect Street is probably derived from the large tract north of Georgetown which the Bealis and Stodderts owned jointly and was aptly named "Pretty Prospect." The Stoddert house fronts on Prospect Street, and the garden ran along Thirty-fourth Street to within a short distance from the Potomac, commanding a charming view of Analostan Island, once the home of Gen. John Mason.

In 1791 Benjamin Stoddert and William Deakins, jr., were in constant correspondence with General Washington as to buying land upon which the Capital City of the United States is

Imagination, says Goethe, is one of the highest human faculties and, while belonging more especially to the artist and poet, is also an attribute of the greatest statesmen, who "see their history written in a nation's eyes." In judgment, says Jefferson, Washington was unapproachable, but may he not be credited also with comprehensive imagination and a strong sense of architection. tural beauty when we look at the Capital of our country, which he laid out, and the designs for the buildings which he approved when he and the comparatively unknown but capable Frenchman, L'Enfant, saw rise before them as in a dream the noble Capitol dominating the wide avenues of the "city beautiful," bordered with stately buildings and handsome residences, filled with prosperous citizens of the new Republic, while lofty monuments to departed greatness and the modern playgrounds for the happy children of the twentieth century show respect for the past and care for the future? Washington had, however, never seen Rome, Vienna, or Paris, yet proved himself the equal of Peter the Great as the founder of a great city and of Louis le Grand in his con-ception of one. No English city seems to have been deliberately planned. London, great as it is, apparently grew as its citizens pleased. Much of the city of Washington's beauty is due to L'Enfant, that man of genius who was familiar with Paris, but a French word, "difficile," must be used to describe a temper which finally wore out even the extraordinary patience of Washington's ington.

is believed that Mr. Stoddert was especially distinguished by the friendship of the general, and that this partially decided the founder of the Federal City to cut out of the original plan of L'Enfant a square containing "Cool Spring," which belonged to Mr. Stoddert. It was near Eastern Branch, and rough stone sidewalks from Georgetown to Washington were provided by Stoddert,

Mr. Stoddert. It was near Eastern Branch, and rough stone sidewalks from Georgetown to Washington were provided by Stoddert, perhaps out of gratitude for this act of consideration.

In 1797 John Adams, previously Vice President to Washington, was inaugurated President. At that time France was governed by the Directory which had succeeded the Reign of Terror. It "expressed serious discontents" at Jay's treaty as aiding England's commerce, and Washington himself, in 1796, selected Maj. Gen. Charles Cotesworth Pinckney, of South Carolina, to succeed Monroe as envoy to France—a man, he says, "whose integrity, talents, experience, and service had made him highly esteemed and respected in the Nation." He was to maintain that good understanding which had hitherto existed between the two nations and restore that cordiality which was at once the evidence and the pledge of a friendly union."

A few days before Pinckney's arrival at Paris, Talleyrand, French Minister of Foreign Affairs, informed Monroe of the formalities to be observed by him in taking leave of France, and by Pinckney preparatory to his reception as an Envoy by the Directory. These formalities they observed exactly and on the 9th of December's presented officially to Talleyrand copies of their respective letters of recall and credence. Two days afterwards Talleyrand wrote to Monroe that the Directory had determined not to receive another minister plenipotentiary from the United States until the grievances complained of by them had been redressed. Cards of hospitality were refused General Pinckney and he was threatened with subjection to the jurisdiction of the Minister of Police which meant arbitrary arrest and subsequent imprisonment in defiance of all diplomatic usage, possibly the guillotine. He was ordered to quit French territory and consequently withdrew to Holland, so that at this time the United States had no representative in the capital of her great Ally.

A second Embassy to France was appointed by Mr. Adams about November, 1797, consisting of

A second Embassy to France was appointed by Mr. Adams about November, 1797, consisting of Pinckney, John Marshall and Elbridge Gerry. They were refused audience both by M. Talleyrand, then Foreign Minister, and by the hostile Directory on the pretext of injury by the Jay Treaty, but were in close association with the persons designated as X. Y. Z. in the communications of the envoys extraordinary of the United States to their government. X was M. Hottguer, Y, M. Bellami, and Z, M. de Hauteval. In the conservation with Pinckney, Marshall, and Gerry, X., M. Hottguer, said: "Gentlemen, you do not speak to the point; it is money; it is expected that you furnish money." "We replied," say the Envoys, "No, not a sixpence." Talleyrand conveyed the idea to them through these emissaries that he expected $250,000 for introducing the Envoys to the Directors, who desired a loan, virtually a gift, of $2,800,000 more. When given audience this proposition was met by Pinckney's immortal exclamation: "Millions for defense but not one cent for tribute," negotiations were broken off and he again withdrew to Holland accompanied by John Marshall, and they were to Phylodelphic in the Value of 1700 when broken off and he again withdrew to Holland accompanied by John Marshall, and they were in Philadelphia in the fall of 1798 when Pinckney's speech was used as a toast at patriotic banquets.

The references in letters of Benjamin Stoddert apply to the third embassy of Messrs. Davie, Ellsworth, and Vans-Murray, who went to Paris in 1798, and were kindly received by First Consul Bonaparte who had put down the directory and restored order in France; and a Convention on the 30th of September, 1800, gave back to the United States ships captured by France, but not yet condemned as prizes, and "provided for freedom of commerce between the two nations, stipulating that 'free ships shall give freedom of goods.' They also made provisions favorable to neutral commerce

At this time, while war was not regularly declared against France, the situation was like that preceding the Revolution when the battles of Lexington and Bunker Hill were fought, bewhen the battles of Lexington and Bunker Hill were fought, before the Declaration of Independence was signed. The necessity for a strong Army and Navy at once became apparent. Hamilton pled for a force of 50,000 men, 10,000 of them to be horse, which Adams laughed at, but as President he thought a Navy and Navy Department essential, and on the 11th of April, 1798, William Bingham, of Pennsylvania, introduced in the Senate a bill "to establish an Executive Department to be denominated the Department of the Navy." This bill was opposed by Humphrey Marshall and Paine, of Vermont, and also by Albert Gallatin, but finally passed both Houses of Congress and on April 30, 1798, received the signature of President Adams. Thus was the Navy Department of the United States separated from that of War.

The Executive Journal of Tuesday, May 1, 1798, leaves no doubt that the President's first nomination for Secretary of the Navy was that of Mr. Cabot, of Massachusetts, as shown by the following letter of that date: 6

"Gentleman of the Senate:
"I nominate Hon. George Cabot of Massachusetts to be Secretary of the Navy.

" JOHN ADAMS."

"Confirmed May 3, 1798."

On May 5 Pickering sent to Cabot his appointment worded thus: "Sir: The President of the United States being desirous of availing the public of your services as Secretary of the Navy of the United States, I have now the honor of inclosing the commission, and of expressing the sentiments of respect with which, the United States, I have now the honor of inclosing the commission, and of expressing the sentiments of respect with which, I am, sir, your most obedient servant.

This commission was inclosed in a letter in which Pickering urges Mr. Cabot to accept the appointment, saying: "If you decline taking the office, where will the country find a substitute? There is not one in Philadelphia, and you will readily believe there is no one southward of it."

On May 11, Cabot, with the promptness of a Boston merchant, replied to this letter refusing this appointment as he had already done that of envoy to France tendered him by the President.

In 1798 letters between Philadelphia and Brookline were not delivered by post in less than six or seven days, as evidenced by the dates of John Adams's own letters, so that the Secretary of State's letter of May 5 could not have reached Mr. Cabot until May 11, nor could his reply of that date have been received by the Department of State in Philadelphia until May 17.

"I afterwards," says Mr. Adams in the Boston Patriot letters, "nominated Mr. Cabot to be Secretary of the Navy, a station as useful, as important, and as honorable as the other," and for which he is eminently qualified. But this he refused." Mr. Henry Cabot Lodge in his Life of His Great-grandfather, George Cabot, quotes this letter but leaves out the last and most important sentence, yet admits the fact in another paragraph. "Fortunately, too," he says, "neither the administration nor the country was embarrassed by his (Cabot's) refusal, since his successor, Mr. Stoddert, proved himself an able and efficient officer." In a note on the same page Mr. Lodge explains: "I say successor, because Mr. Cabot actually held the office for a month, and his name stands first on the list of the Secretary of the Navy," but the dates cited below prove the unintentional inaccurary of Mr. Lodge's statement of facts. The Quinquennial Catalogue (1782-1835), of Harvard University, records George Cabot's appointment as Secretary of the Navy, "Gentlemen of the Senate: I nominate Benjamin Stoddert, of Maryland, to be Secretary of the Navy in place of George Cabot, who has declined his appointment.

Confirmed May 21, 1798."

On May 26, Mr. Stoddert wrote the following letter to Francis Lowndes:

"Dear Sm: I suppose you have heard of my appointment to be Secretary of the Navy of the United States. I have not determined to accept—and what you will think more extraordinary—I have not determined to refuse. I hate office—have no desire for fancied or real importance and wish to spend my life in retirement and ease without bustle of any kind. Yet it seems for fancied or real importance and wish to spend my life in retirement and ease without bustle of any kind. Yet it seems cowardly at such a time as this to refuse an important and highly responsible position. * * You know I have heretofore managed peaceable ships very well. Why should I not be able to direct as well those of war? After all this preface I think there is about 30 to I that I shall not accept. But that I may be able to consider every side of the question let me know whether you will, in case I do accept, undertake to act as owner of my concerns on the Beaver Dam for two years and a half. * * All this would require some of your time and some attention. I know if you would take it at all it would be to serve me. But, to have a proper tie upon your conscience I should insist on your receiving a commission on all the money received for the wood and the products of both places. * * "After two and a half years, both Becky (who is not alarmed at the idea of Philadelphia) and myself shall be fond enough of spending the rest of our time in tranquillity at Bladensburg. "I am, dear sir, yours sincerely,

"B. STODDERT."

Nothing can be proved by that authority, except that Cabot entered Harvard in 1766 but did not graduate as he left there a sophomore in 1768 and went to sea. He did not become Secretary of the Navy before that department existed in his twenty-ninth year. He was Senator from Massachusetts, 1791 to 1796, when he year. He resigned.

¹¹ U. S. Navy Register, 1782-1882, by Thomas H. S. Hamersley, Military and Naval Publisher, Washington, D. C.

Mrs. Stoddert would, no doubt, have objected to coming down to posterity as "Becky" when she owned the stately name of Rebecca

On the 18th of June Major Stoddert wrote three letters, one to On the 18th of June Major Stoddert wrote three letters, one to the Treasury Department asking for a statement in respect to the purchase of the 12 ships authorized by Congress, and the other two to Captain Jeremiah Yellott, Navy agent at Baltimore. These letters were the first that were written by the American Navy Department, and show the energy and enthusiasm with which the first Secretary took up his patriotic duties. In the second of these letters Mr. Stoddert says:

"I mentioned to you in a letter of to-day that I had not before entered upon the duties of my office, in fact I have not yet taken the oath of office, this I shall do to-morrow, and by the next post shall write you officially."

"My My Hory here here absent ever since my arrived here—now your knowledge and worth can be obtained, I shall not despair of discharging the duties of my office with promptness and economy, two things highly essential to be observed in the present crisis of our affairs."

The ships that were ordered by General Washington and named by Pickering in 1794 were the United States, which did not sail until July, 1798; Constellation, June, 1798; Constitution, July 20, 1798; Congress, 1799; President, 1801; and Chesapeake, 1800, and the first instructions given by the new department to the Navy were as follows:

Instructions to the Commanders of armed vessels, belonging

"Instructions to the Commanders of armed vessels, belonging to the United States, were given at Philadelphia, the tenth day of July in the year of our Lord, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-eight, and in the twenty-third year of our Independence.

"In pursuance of the Acts of Congress passed on the 28th day of May, the twenty-eighth day of June, and the ninth day of July:

"You are, hereby, authorized, instructed, and directed to subdue, seize, and take any armed French vessel or vessels sailing under authority or pretense of authority from the French Republic which shall be found within the jurisdictional limits of the United States, or elsewhere on the high seas; and such captured vessel with her Apparel, Guns, and Appurtenances, and the Goods and Effects which shall be found on board the same, together with all French persons and others, who shall be found acting on board; to bring her within some port of the United States; and also to retake any vessels, Goods, and Effects of the Citizens of the United States, or persons resident therein which may have been captured by any French Vessel, in order that proceedings may be had concerning such capture or recapture in due form or Law, and as to right shall appertain. shall appertain.

And the following circular was issued by Mr. Stoddert on December 29, 1798, to the "Commanders of armed vessels in the service of the United States," and refers especially to conflicts with the Barbary pirates who infested the Mediterranean and were finally Barbary pirates who infested the Mediterranean and were finally driven out by our Navy.

"Sir,—It is the positive command of the President that on no pretense whatever you permit the public vessel of war under your command to be detained or searched, nor any of the officers or men belonging to her to be taken from her, by the ships or vessels of any foreign nation, so long as you are in a capacity to repel such outrage on the honor of the American flag. If force should be exerted to compel your submission, you are to resist that force to the utmost of your power, and when overpowered by superior force you are to strike your flag, and thus yield your vessel as well as your men; but never your men without your vessel.

"You will remember, however, that your demeanor be respectful and friendly to the vessels and people of all nations in amity with the United States; and that you avoid as carefully the commission of, as the submission to, insult or injury.

"BEN STODDERT." In the same month Stoddert had reported to the "Committee of the House on the Naval Establishment" that "docks will be highly necessary in repairing our ships, to avoid the tedious, expensive and sometimes dangerous operation of heaving down. They can undoubtedly be made in the Eastern States, where the tides rise very considerably; probably in New Hampshire, Massachusetts, and Rhode Island," and added, that if they could be made to equal advantage to the southward, it would be well to have a dock near the entrance of the Chesapeake Bay. In January, 1800, Humphreys was sent to New England to select eligible sites for these future docks. Humphreys chose Newport as the best and the Secretary of the Navy agreed with him, but Adams's administration went out of office before the affair had been concluded. "It was certainly not the fault of the Secretary of the Navy that docks were not erected. When Humphreys was about to leave for New England on his tour of inspection, Stoddert's instructions were that it was proper that a dock 'should be begun," at a place and on a plan capable of great extension. Although a dock sufficient to contain not more than one ship will be attempted in the first instance, it ought to be foreseen that it may be necessary to annex to it hereafter docks to contain 20 ships of the line, and that the works now to be erected should constitute a permanent part of the whole establishment. It was, however, many years before the American Navy was to have a single dock; and even at the present time its docking facilities are hardly so extensive as those planned by the first Secretary of the Navy." ¹⁵

Stoddert established six Navy Yards, and also placed Navy agents at the most important Atlantic ports, but the Washington Navy Yard was not acquired until 1800. It was put under charge of that able officer, Commodore Tingey, and was burned by him in the panic of 1814, when Cockburn took Washington and burned the Executive Mansion of that time.

In 1798 the Navy Department, newly organized, was housed in two rooms in Philadelphia. It was small but efficient. Joshua Humphreys, the best American shipbuilder, was attached to it as "Principal Naval Constructor of the United States" with a salary of $2,000. He was the technical counselor of the Secretary who as a member of the Cabinet received $3,000.

It was also during Mr. Stoddert's term of office that the Marine Corps was reorganized. On the 11th of July, 1798, an act was approved "for the establishing and organizing a 'Marine Corps.'" This was practically a revival of the Marine Corps of the Continental times which had so distinuished itself after 1775.

In 1797 three ships constituted the United States Navy; at the close of 1798, 20 ships were in commission; in December, 1799, 33. Finally the Navy force during the French War amounted, according to Thomas Clark, to 40 vessels; another estimate declared it to be 50 vessels of various sorts. 18

clared it to be 50 vessels of various sorts. ¹²

Three days after the organization of the Navy Department, on June 21, 1798, President John Adams, incensed by the treatment of Pinckney in France, declared: "I will never send another minister to France without assurance that he will be received, respected, and honored as the representative of a great, free, powerful, and independent Nation," so that diplomatic relations with that country were practically broken off at that date and preparations for war with France, our strongest ally during the American Revolution, begun. The correspondence laid before Congress at tions for war with France, our strongest ally during the American Revolution, begun. The correspondence laid before Congress at this time is known as the X. Y. Z. papers, as these letters were used as a cipher to conceal the names of the tools of Talleyrand and the French Directory.

Before the year 1798 closed, Captain Decatur (not Stephen Decatur, but his father) made a capture of L'Incroyable, and on February 9, 1799, Commodore Truxton, commanding the Constellation, captured L'Insurgente, the fastest ship of the French Navy, and disabled La Vengence, while on his cruises in the West Indies, which have been called the school of the old American Navy of wooden sailing ships, as "the years from 1798 to 1815 have been declared to be the heroic age of the American Navy."

Truxton's ship, the Constellation, was built at the shipyard of David Stodder, of Baltimore. "She has been described as one of those happy first products of our Navy that were never afterward surpassed. In beauty of hull she was not even equalled by the famous Constitution. The easy swell of her sides and the general harmony of her proportions were incomparable."

Truxton's victory over the French ships brought great distinc-Truxton's victory over the French ships brought great distinction to the new navy and began the enlistment under Stoddert of what he demanded, "sprightly, well-educated young men of good principles and spirit." "such as Stephen Decatur, who entered as a midshipman at 19 in 1798; William Bainbridge, formerly in the merchant service; Isaac Hull, aged 23, and Jacob Jones, who at the age of 29 became midshipman, as did James Lawrence on the 14th of September, 1798; William Allen in May, 1800, and William Burrows in the same year. Oliver H. Perry entered the Navy on April 7, 1799; Theodore Hunt about the same time. David Porter, who at 16 had twice resisted a British press gang, became a midshipman at this time; Johnson Blakely and gang, became a midshipman at this time; Johnson Blakely and Lewis Warrington in 1800. In 1798 Charles Stewart and James Barron sought and obtained lieutenancies.

The popularity of the Navy was such that it was more difficult to keep men out of it than to enlist them; in fact, Stoddert so increased the number of midshipmen that he said he "was ashamed of himself." Soon there was a bitter strife between Captains Truxton and Talbot as to their relative rank. Truxton offered his resignation, which he subsequently withdrew, and Talbot did resign. Stoddert wrote in 1799: "This avarice of rank in the infancy of our service is the devil."

In the days of flogging with cat-o'-nine-tails at the will of the ship's captain, Truxton had but one flogging on the Constellation and the gallant tars of that celebrated frigate were so patriotic that they were content with rations of "salt horse" and stale pilot bread, washed down with water of doubtful freshness, provided victory crowned the Stars and Stripes at the mast-head!

In March, 1800, Congress voted a gold medal to Commodore Thomas Truxton with the "Thanks of the Nation," and a silver service costing 600 guineas, or over $3,000, was presented to him by the merchants of London. But the handsomest tribute he received was that of Barreau, the defeated Commander of L'Insurgente, who congratulated himself upon having been made captive by an officer "uniting in himself all the qualities which characterize a man of honor, courage and humanity!" Yet in spite of the homage of friend and foe, Jefferson felt compelled to accept Truxton's hastily offered resignation and thus the Navy lost its best officer.

The yellow fever which had lurked in Philadelphia since 1793, became epidemic in 1799, and was peculiarly fatal about the wharves where the West India fleet anchored. The porter of the Navy Department died of it, and the Government was finally forced to move to Trenton, whence Secretary Stoddert wrote the President two letters from which the following extracts are

As I have ever considered this maneuvre of the French as the deepest and sublest, which the genius of the Directory and their minister has ever invented for the division of our people, I am determined, if they ever suc-ceed in it, the world shall be convinced that their success was owing either to want of capacity, or want of support, in.

On the 13th of September Major Stoddert again wrote to President Adams:

"Whether it be decided to suspend the mission, or otherwise, the decision may and will be important. It will be a great measure either way, and will be attended with consequences in proportion to its magnitude. All the solemnity possible should perhaps be given to the decision. General Washington, one of the most attentive men in the world to the manner of doing things, owed a great proportion of his celebrity to this circumstance. It appears to me that the decision in question would be better suppears to me, that the decision in question would be better sup-ported throughout the country, if it be taken when you are sur-rounded by the officers of government and the ministers, even if it should be against their unanimous advice * * * Colonel rounded by the officers of government and the ministers, even if it should be against their unanimous advice * * * Colonel Pickering is certainly too much occupied with the business of his department to find time to understand this subject so well as our commissioners and the Attorney General must do; and it has, therefore, appeared to me that the best course would be to call these gentlemen, at least the Attorney General, to the seat of government to prepare the representation, which should afterwards be pruned by the heads of the departments of everything like acrimony, and of any argument, if any such found admittance, calculated to confute rather than to convince. * * I have given my opinions with candor, but with great difficence; for I am sensible that I am but a poor politician. I hope you will not think the trouble of an answer at all necessary. Whatever course you take, my inclination will prompt me to think right, and my duty to support.

"BEN STODDERT."

It is alleged, and apparently proved, that three members of Adams's Cabinet were bitterly but covertly opposed to his nomination for another term. Finally all three resigned. Stoddert and Charles Lee were faithful to their chief.

General Washington made a visit to Philadelphia in November, 1798, evidently to give his opinion to the administration as to resenting what John Marshall called, when he returned from France in October of that year, "the open contumely and undisguised insult suffered to the United States in the persons of their ministers, when under slight pretexts the executive (the French Directory) delayed to accredit them as representatives of an independent nation."

Already on the 18th of October of that year Washington had written to Timothy Pickering: "My opinion always has been (however necessary to be in a state of preparation) that no formidable invasion is to be apprehended from France while Great Britain and that country are at war—not from any favorable disposition the latter has toward us, but from actual inability to transport troops and munitions of war while their ports are blockaded."

On Sartember 12 14 14

On September 16, Adams wrote to Pickering: "The revolution in the revival of the clubs and the strong appearances of another reign of democratic fury and sanguinary anarchy in France, seems to justify a relaxation of our zeal for the sudden and hasty departure of our envoys"—but on October 16, Stoddert was ordered immediately to "transmit orders to Captain Barry to receive on board his frigate and convey to France, and such port of France as they shall desire, our envoys to the French Republic." Davie, Ellsworth, Gerry seem to have been in France since 1797.

Major Stoddert had already been at the seat of government, then in Philadelphia, some months when his family joined him in November, 1798. At this time Mrs. Stoddert wrote some letters to her cousin, Miss Eliza Gantt, of Graden, in Prince Georges County, Maryland, some of which were published a few years ago in Lippincott's Magazine. The Stodderts at first stopped at Mrs. Rosanna White's, Eighth and Chestnut Streets, and then took the house of Major Jackson, Washington's aide-de-camp, at Tenth and Chestnut, "a very retired part of the City," says this Maryland lady. "I declare, at night and in the night it is much more quiet than Georgetown; nothing to be heard but the Watchman. Mrs. White (the sister-in-law of Bishop White) lives charmingly and to appearance and I dare say in reallity [sie] everything is clean, and only genteel people board there. I, for the first time for twenty large odd years, saw General Washington there; it is his boarding house, too. We breakfasted together every morning, but only dined with him once, and that was last Sunday; he makes a point of not going abroad on Sundays, I am told, and I suppose that was the reason he dined at Mrs. White's last Sunday. He receives invitations constantly every day I believe, to dine out."

day I believe, to dine out."

General Washington's diary at this time bears witness to the accuracy of this piece of "antediluvian gossip." In it he says: "Dined at Doctor White's (Bishop of Penn.), dined with Bingham (Mrs. Bingham nee Willing was the leader of fashion in Philadelphia at that time), with President Adams, 180 High Street, and also with Robert Morris," who was then in the debtor's apartment of the old Walnut Street Prison at Sixth and Walnut. Robert Morris, who practically financed the Revolution, had become bankrupt and suffered the rigors of the law. Stoddert is said by family tradition to have lent him $30,000 dollars—which he lost by Morris's failure.

he lost by Morris's failure.

he lost by Morris's failure.

The only record of the table talk of the "Cincinnatus of the West" is "that even General Washington talked of ladies wearing wigs," and Mrs. Stoddert bows to him as an arbiter of fashion—a new rôle for the hero of Valley Forge and Trenton.

Washington died on the 14th of December, 1799. On the 26th of the same month there was a memorial service for him in Philadelphia, and Ben. Stoddert and James McHenry were two of the pallbearers, according to the account in the Centinel newspaper of that week. Elizabeth Stoddert, worte to "My dear Miss Lowndes," her mother's sister, of the "Funeral Eulogium by General Lee" and of "the most splendid procession ever seen in America."

In 1800 the Government removed to Washington and the "Navy ffice" was established at 2107 Pennsylvania Avenue. The family of the secretary returned to their old home in Georgetown, ambiged Mrs. Stoddert died a few years later and is buried at Addison's Chapel in Maryland. She left eight children and Mr. Stoddert proved himself a tender and judicious father to them, and they regarded him with a fondness and admiration rare in these days of parental criticism.

Before the Government was removed to Washington, McHenry resigned the secretaryship of War and Mr. Adams wrote to Stod-

BEN STODDERT.

In March, 1801, when Jefferson became President, Mr. Stoddert was invited to remain in office, and did so for one month. Thus he was Secretary of the Navy under two rival administrations, and of war also for some weeks, but owing to the unpopularity of the Federalists, neither Mr. Adams nor he received the credit due that administration for creating "the nucleus of the gallant little navy which won such triumphs over England in 1812."

Charles W. Goldsborough, who was appointed to office in the Navy Department in 1798, served in it continuously for nearly 40 years. He said of Stoddert's appointment as Secretary that it was the best that could have been made, as "to the most ardent patriotism he united an inflexible integrity, a discriminating mind, great capacity for business, and a most persevering industry."

An apparent proof of his success in organization is that in this very year of 1916 "The Judge Advocate General has lately recommended the codification of the articles for the government of the navy. There has been no revision of the articles since 1800, and many of them are antiquated. They were formulated to apply very year of 1916 "The Judge Advocate General has lately recommended the codification of the articles for the government of the navy. There has been no revision of the articles since 1800, and many of them are antiquated. They were formulated to apply to the navy in the days of sailing ships."

The appropriation for the Navy which Mr. Stoddert's report (as head of the organized department) influenced Congress to make on February 25, 1799, was for $1,000,000, less than has lately been allowed for one Navy Yard. With that amount he managed to build a Navy,—which John Adams says "called suddenly into existence by a great national exigency, has raised us in our own esteem and by the protection afforded our commerce has effected to the extent of our expectations the objects for which it was created." The last appearance in public of Major Stoddert was at the funeral of his old friend, General Lingan, who was killed during the attack of a Baltimore mob on A. C. Hanson, editor in 1812 of the Baltimore Federal Republican newspaper. General "Lighthorse" Harry Lee, who was sent to put down the revolt, received grave injuries from which he never recovered. Lingan's mangled body was not allowed to be given to his family, but the people assembled in multitudes near Georgetown for funeral services, at which Colonel Stuart and Major Stoddert, both old Revolutionary soldiers, supported on the platform the venerable Major Musgrove, "disfigured by wounds received in the midnight defense of the Federal journal." The oration was by G. W. P. Custis, Washington's adopted grandson.

The man who won the confidence of Washington, the affection of Adams, the esteem of Jefferson, the intimate friendship of "Lighthorse" Harry Lee and Francis Scott Key, the respect of Aaron Burr, the warm support of Truxton and Decatur was, as he said of himself, but a "poor politician." Yet he gave to his country the unstinted service of his best years and never forfeited his integrity for place, power, or wealth. He died in 1813 and was laid at Addison's

MEDICINAL LIQUORS

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 14395) relating to the prescribing of medicinal liquors, and I call for a quorum.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold his suggestion of the absence of a quorum for a moment? Mr. LONG. I will.

Mr. McNARY. Is it the Senator's purpose to displace the unfinished business?

Mr. LONG. Yes; and we can come back to that. I hope we can pass this little liquor bill for the benefit of the suffering people of the country.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it. Mr. McNARY. Is the motion debatable?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is debatable.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I desire to debate the motion for the benefit of the suffering people of the country. The VICE PRESIDENT. The suggestion of the absence of a quorum is not debatable.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I wish to have my motion submitted to the Senate. If the Senator from Iowa insists upon making a speech I do not want to call a quorum. I was calling a quorum so that we might vote upon the question of whether or not we shall proceed to this emergency legislation.

For the benefit of the Senator from Iowa let me state that I understand it is true that it has received at least the silent approval of the Anti-Saloon League and parties on that side of the question. It is not a controversial bill and I hope the Senator from Iowa will not bring in any controversy over a matter that is so humanly satisfactory to all elements and interests.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I have some very different advices from those apparently received by the Senator from Louisiana about the Anti-Saloon League and other temperance societies. As I see it there are several things that the Senate might be doing with greater profit than considering a booze bill. The first vote we had when we came into session in this Congress was on a booze bill, and the last vote shall not be on a booze bill if I can prevent it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Louisiana insist upon his suggestion of the absence of a quorum? Mr. LONG. No; I do not insist upon it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. BROOKHART. If we are going to vote on that question, I call for a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on agreeing to the motion proposed by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. Long].

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I wish to state that this is not a controversial liquor bill at all. It is a medical bill, a medicinal bill asked for by the American Medical Association, by practically all of the physicians and surgeons in America. It is an apothecary bill. It has passed the House and has been unanimously approved by the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, by people who were labelled prohibitionists and antiprohibitionists, all of them being in favor of it. Not a word of opposition was heard to it until the distinguished Senator from Iowa [Mr. Brookhart] got up and referred to it as a booze bill.

The bill has been introduced and it is desired to pass it in order to furnish better material so long as the fast fading prohibition law remains in existence. It is done in order that the physicians of the country and the apothecaries may prescribe lawfully and legally such medicine as is necessary in the treatment of their cases.

I am sorry to see the Senator from Iowa come here the sole man in the whole length and breadth of the two Houses of Congress and open his mouth against the bill. Even Bishop Cannon has not been heard from. No one has said a word against it except the Senator from Iowa. I think the Senator from Iowa knows too little about this medicinal subject to try to discuss it. I asked for a quorum merely in order to obtain a vote. I hope we can have a vote on whether we shall or shall not consider the matter. I ask for a vote if we can get it.

Mr. BROOKHART obtained the floor.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa yield to me for a few moments? I wish to make a brief statement having no bearing on the pending question.

Mr. BROOKHART. Very well; I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

TRIBUTE TO THE VICE PRESIDENT AND SENATOR SWANSON

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I think it was Garfield who said that the sweetest flowers that bloom are those which climb and trail and blossom across the garden walls of party politics. Year after year we have seen that very beautiful statement verified and exemplified in our lives in the House of Representatives and in the Senate.

I was in full accord and in hearty sympathy with the beautiful sentiments expressed regarding the Vice President of the United States, who is about to retire from his exalted office. The occasion recalled vividly to my mind, and I felt impelled to mention, that in 1892 the present Vice President and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. Swanson] were elected to the House and took their seats there just 40 years ago. I was elected to the House in 1894.

The Senator from Virginia is about to take his place as a member of the new Cabinet; the Vice President is retiring to private life; and, by the almost unanimous consent of the people of Indiana, I am about to follow the same course.

The Senator from Virginia is therefore the only Member in either the House of Representatives or the Senate who was a Member when I came here, and during all these years I have entertained for him the very highest respect and the greatest confidence. When I was the Republican whip in the House of Representatives the Senator from Virginia was the Democratic whip there. At that time we became very much attached, and during the years that attachment has ripened into what I conceive to be a very beautiful affection. In the meantime I had a leave of absence, for which I did not ask, but the Senator from Virginia never had one. He served in the other House for a dozen years; he immediately thereafter became the governor of his State, where he served four years; and he then came to the Senate. So in 40 years the Senator from Virginia has never skipped a beat and has never missed a day in public office. At no time has he ever betrayed the confidence of the people nor lost the respect of his constituency. I am very happy to-day to say that he leaves this

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Eighty-nine Senators | body with the respect of its entire Membership, with the confidence of his constituency, and with the grateful recognition of all the people of the United States who are familiar with his service and his record.

It is not for me to say whether taking a Cabinet position is a promotion or a demotion, but I, myself, look upon it as a demotion. I think it is a greater recognition of a man's ability and of his standing to be elected by the people than it is to be appointed by any man to any office; but that is for the Senator from Virginia to decide. He having chosen to take the Cabinet position, I know I voice the sentiment of all my colleagues on this side of the aisle when I say that he leaves the Senate of the United States with the confidence, with the respect, and with the affection, which he so richly deserves, of every Republican Member of this body. [Applause on the floor.]

MEDICINAL LIQUORS

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, there is no need of my insisting on my motion against which the Senator from Iowa is going to filibuster. I disapprove of filibustering so much [laughter] that I do not think I should be a party to a filibuster even to the extent of persisting in a motion that might bring a filibuster on. So I withdraw my request, put up the white flag, and let the Senator have his way about it.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I consent to the withdrawal of the motion.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the House insisted upon its amendments to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 197) conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims in the claim of P. F. Gormley Co., disagreed to by the Senate; agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. ALLGOOD, Mr. MARTIN of Oregon, and Mr. SINCLAIR Were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

The message also announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the following enrolled bills, and they were signed by the Vice President:

S. 660. An act for the relief of Hamilton Grounds:

S. 5612. An act to provide for the selection of certain lands in the State of California for the use of the California State park system:

H. R. 13520. An act making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 14458. An act making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, and for other purposes.

CONSIDERATION OF UNOBJECTED BILLS ON THE CALENDAR

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, after conference with the clerk, I find that there are about 50 House bills on the calendar which have not yet received the consideration of the Senate. Inasmuch as the time for the expiration of the Senate is near at hand, I propose the unanimous-consent agreement which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unanimous-consent agreement preferred by the Senator from Oregon will be stated.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, by unanimous consent, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of unobjected bills on the calendar under minute rule, beginning with Order of Business No. 1413.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, that is the order of business at which we left off, I understand, on the last call of the calendar.

Mr. McNARY. Yes; that is the one.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request for unanimous consent? The Chair hears none and the agreement is entered into. The clerk will state the first bill on the calendar.

The bill (H. R. 7167) for the relief of Stuart L. Ritz was announced as first on the calendar, and the Senate proceeded to its consideration.

Mr. KING. Has that bill been reported by the Senate committee?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has been. There being no objection, the bill was read, considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed,

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers Stuart L. Ritz, late of Company L, Second Regiment United States Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States on the 22d day of April, 1899: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

ROBERT J. FOSTER

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2167) for the relief of Robert J. Foster, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, on page 1, line 9, to strike out "15th day of August" and insert "26th day of October," so as to make the bill read:

That in the administration of any laws Be it enacted, etc., Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers Robert J. Foster, who was a member of Company C, Sixth Regiment United States Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a private of that organization on the 26th day of October, 1901: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LAKE ODDIE

The bill (S. 5693) giving the name "Lake Oddie" to the body of water resulting from the construction of Hoover Dam, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I ask that that bill may be temporarily laid aside until the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] shall be present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be temporarily passed over.

JOHN S. STOTTS

The bill (H. R. 2803) for the relief of John S. Stotts, deceased, was read, considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (H. R. 14395) relating to the prescribing of medicinal liquors was announced as next in order.

Mr. BROOKHART. Over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

WALTER SAM YOUNG

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 2907) for the relief of Walter Sam Young, which had been reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs, with an amendment, on page 1, line 9, after the word "Provided," to strike out "That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act," and insert "That no compensation, retirement pay, back pay, pension, or other benefit shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged sailors Walter Sam Young, late of the United States Navy, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been discharged under honorable conditions from the naval service of the United States as a member of that organization on the 16th day of July, 1920: Provided, That no compensation, retirement pay, back pay, pension, or other benefit shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

NORTHERN CHEYENNE INDIAN TRIBAL COUNCIL

The bill (H. R. 11896) to provide for expenses of the Northern Cheyenne Indian Tribal Council and authorized delegates of the tribe was read, considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated the sum of $1,000, or as much thereof as may be necessary, of the funds standing to the credit of the Northern Cheyenne Indians in the Treasury of the United States for expenses of the Northern Cheyenne Indian Tribal Council and authorized delements of the tribal council. gates of the tribe.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 3037) to protect labor in its old age was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, this is a Senate bill. I understood we were considering only House bills.

Mr. McNARY. Oh, no. Mr. President, there is no limitation as to the bills to be considered on the calendar. Bills are to be considered in consecutive order whether House bills or Senate bills.

Mr. SMOOT. I object to this bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over. WATER SUPPLY OF UNITED STATES NAVAL STATION AT GUANTANAMO BAY, CUBA

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1656) to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to make a long-term contract for a supply of water to the United States naval station at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

Mr. KING. Let the bill be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs, with an amendment, on page 2, line 3, after the word "Government," to insert: "Any contract entered into pursuant to the provisions of this act shall contain a provision authorizing the Secretary of the Navy within a reasonable period of time prior to the | tion."

expiration of such contract to extend the contract for a further period of 20 years or longer, and such Secretary is hereby authorized to enter into such extension, but the cost of supplying water thereunder shall be the average annual cost of operation of the plant during the last 10 years of the contract entered into pursuant to this act, plus 10 per cent thereof, in addition to the actual cost of any improvements deemed necessary by said Secretary," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby authorized and empowered, at his discretion, to negotiate and enter into a contract for a period of 20 years or longer, with the lowest responsible and capable bidder, for supplying the United States naval station at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, with an adequate and satisfactory supply of water, suitable for all purposes, delivered into the water-storage reservoirs within said naval station, in such an amount as he shall deem adequate for naval station, in such an amount as he shall deem adequate for the present and future needs of the station, and at such annual cost or rental as in his judgment may be for the best interests of the Government. Any contract entered into pursuant to the provisions of this act shall contain a provision authorizing the Secretary of the Navy within a reasonable period of time prior to the expiration of such contract to extend the contract for a further period of 20 years or longer, and such Secretary is hereby authorized to enter into such extension, but the cost of supplying water thereunder shall be the average annual cost of operation of the plant during the last 10 years of the contract entered into pursuant to this act, plus 10 per cent thereof, in addition to the acual cost of any improvements deemed necessary by such Secretary.

Sec. 2. This act shall become effective immediately upon its passage and approval.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FEES FOR RECORDER OF DEEDS

The bill (S. 4928) to provide fees to be charged by the recorder of deeds of the District of Columbia, was announced as next in order.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I ask to have the bill read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senator from Florida to request that the bill be read. The clerk will read the bill.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, this is a Senate bill and there will be no hope of passing it through the House. So I think it had better go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed

REGULATION OF BANKING IN THE DISTRICT

The bill (H. R. 6402) to further regulate banking, banks, trust companies, and building and loan associations in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I do not see the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia present on the floor. I was going to ask for a brief explanation of the bill.

Mr. Mckellar. It is a very important bill, Mr. President, and I think it better go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed

BENJAMIN WRIGHT

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3789) for the relief of Benjamin Wright, which had been reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs with an amendment, on line 5, after the name "Wright," to insert the word "deceased," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, Benjamin Wright, deceased, who was a lieutenant, junior grade, United States Navy, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the naval service of the United States on January 19, 1899: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I notice that the proviso at the end of the bill does not include the word "compensa-

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me | this is a Spanish War case and no compensation will be pay-

Mr. McKELLAR. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of Benjamin Wright, deceased."

ALLOTMENTS OF DECEASED INDIANS

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 14059) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior in behalf of the Indians to purchase the allotments of deceased Indians, and for other purposes.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, this bill is the same as Calendar No. 1297, being Senate bill 5483. I suggested some amendments to the Senate bill, and I move that the House bill now pending be amended to conform with the amendments suggested by me to the bill referred to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments offered by the Senator from North Dakota will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, line 12, after "Sec. 3," it is proposed to strike out "Where Indian tribal funds are" and to insert in lieu thereof "With the consent of the tribal council of any tribe the funds of such tribe may be."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, line 13, it is proposed to strike out " is " and insert " so."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, line 4, it is proposed to strike out "such land" and insert in lieu thereof "shall become tribal lands and any land so bought."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, line 17, after the word "tribe," it is proposed to insert the words "with or."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 3, it is proposed to strike out all of line 1, after the word "approval," and all of lines 2, 3, and 4.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I see from a hasty reading of the report on this bill that the bill would require the purchase of from five to seven million acres of land; and I see that the bill is adversely reported on by the Assistant Commissioner of Indian Affairs and by the Secretary of the Interior. What can the Senator tell us about that?

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Assistant Commissioner are in favor of the bill. The objection is from the Budget Bureau; but there will not be any money appropriated at this time. It is to cure an existing condition among the Indians regarding the heirship of their property. We believe that it will be a good thing, and the Indians throughout the country are for it. The House committee inform me that they are for these amendments, and I believe they will accept them.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator tell us how much expense this is going to let us in for?

Mr. FRAZIER. None at all at the present time.

Mr. McKELLAR. How much does it authorize for the future?

Mr. FRAZIER. There is no authorization of any expenditure at present.

Mr. REED. The authorization is for so much as is necessary.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the authorization is made, immediately on the convening of the next Congress there will be a bill to appropriate the money to carry it out.

Mr. FRAZIER. Of course, no one knows how much it

Mr. McKELLAR. Is there an estimate of how much it will be?

Mr. FRAZIER. Under the present law, when an Indian dies who has allotted property, the property is sold and the money is divided among the heirs. The purpose of this loan associations-bill is to provide that under certain conditions the land maybe bought by the heirs of the deceased or be purchased by the department for the Indians themselves, for the tribe.

Mr. McKELLAR. Is it confined solely to the Indians' money, or does the Government have to pay for the land?

Mr. FRAZIER. In some instances, where there are no tribal funds, there would have to be an appropriation from the Government.

Mr. REED. Is it true that the bill involves the purchase of 5,000,000 acres of land?

Mr. FRAZIER. No. no; I do not think it would ever run into any figures of that kind?

Mr. McKELLAR. I think there ought to be some limitation on it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. McKELLAR. Wait one moment. It seems to me we ought not to give an unlimited authorization of this kind; and I hope the Senator will not insist upon it.

Mr. FRAZIER. Of course, before any money could be appropriated for any of this land, the authorization would have to be given by Congress.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, yes, or course; but as soon as that authorization is given, immediately a Budget estimate is sent down to carry out the authorization of Congress, and we all know what the answer is to that.

I think the bill ought to go over, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

REGULATION OF BANKING IN THE DISTRICT

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, a few moments ago the Senate passed over Order of Business 1435, House bill 6402, to further regulate banking, banks, trust companies, and building and loan associations in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes. That is a bill that has been very carefully considered, and the passage of which is very much desired by the District Commissioners and by the Comptroller of the Currency. I can explain the bill in just a few moments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to returning to House bill 6402? The Chair hears none.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I do not object to turning back to the bill; but here is a statement from the Secretary of the Treasury about this bill which seems to be applicable to the present situation. He says:

The Comptroller of the Currency has asked me to get in touch with you with reference to S. 2329, introduced by you. I understand that hearings have been held and that the House bill (H. R. 6402) was reported out and passed by the House on April 11, but the Senate bill is still being held in subcommittee. In view of the fact that the time is growing short, isn't it possible to substitute the House bill for the Senate bill and have the former reported out and passed?

We have a very short time. This is a very important bill, and it seems to me it ought to go over.

Mr. CAPPER. But it has been before the subcommittee of the Senate for almost a year, in charge of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE]. The Senator from Wisconsin has gone over it very thoroughly, and authorized me to say to the Senate that he is in favor of the legislation as it passed the House, and thinks it ought to be passed. I have heard of no one who is opposed to any part of the bill. It has been before both Houses for a year.

Mr. McKELLAR. What does the bill do, Mr. President? Mr. CAPPER. The Senator will find, on page 3 of the report of the committee, a statement of the facts. It goes on to say that-

There are in the District of Columbia under supervision of the Comptroller of the Currency 12 national banks, 22 savings banks, and 5 trust companies—a total of 39 banks and 24 building and loan associations. Prior to 1922 there was no provision of law which would prohibit anyone from doing a banking business in the District of Columbia, regardless of his financial responsibility, character, or ability, if he saw fit to do such business. The same situation is now true with respect to building and loan associations—

The measure applies more particularly to building and and although the comptroller must supervise by examinations such institutions if they start business, there is no limitation on the right of anyone to start such a building and loan association regardless of qualifications, need for such association. etc.

Farther down, under "Section 1," it is said:

As previously explained, while the comptroller must supervise building and loan associations which start business in the District of Columbia, under the present law there is no way to prohibit anyone forming such an association regardless of financial stability, business qualifications, or the need for such association.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator from Kansas that this may be a very good bill, but it has an elaborate scheme of control of banks, building and loan associations, and trust companies. I doubt very much whether we ought to let it go through at the last moment of the session.

Mr. CAPPER. The bill has had weeks of consideration by both the House banking subcommittee and the Senate banking subcommittee of the Committee on the District of Columbia, of which the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE] is chairman. That committee went into it thoroughly. The District Commissioners and other officials are all very strong for it and think it is highly important that it should be passed as early as possible.

Mr. McKELLAR. Let me call attention to one of the dangers about it. I read from page 6 of the bill:

dangers about it. I read from page 6 of the bill:

(c) Each bank and trust company doing business in the District of Columbia and not a member of the Federal reserve system shall, within six months from the enactment of this section, establish and maintain reserves on the same basis and subject to the same conditions as may by law now or hereafter be prescribed for national banks located in the District of Columbia, except that such reserves shall be established and maintained at such agency or agencies which shall have the approval of the Comptroller of the Currency: Provided, however, (1) That the required reserves carried by such bank or trust company with an agency or agencies may, under the regulations and subject to such penalties as may be prescribed by the Comptroller of the Currency, be checked against and withdrawn by such bank or trust company for the purpose of meeting existing liabilities, and (2) that no such bank or trust company shall at any time make new loans or shall pay any dividends unless and until the total reserves required by law shall be fully restored

When the banks are in a more peculiar position than they ever have been before, perhaps, in their history, to put these different provisions in a new bill, making new requirements, it seems to me would be a very unwise thing to do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Kansas has expired.

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall have to object to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

CLASSIFICATION OF COTTON

The Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 434) to authorize and direct the Secretary of Agriculture to provide additional facilities for the classification of cotton under the United States cotton standards act, which was read, as follows:

which was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of Agriculture be requested to extend to cotton growers facilities for the classification of cotton authorized in the United States cotton standards act of March 4, 1923 (42 Stat. L. 1517), with such supervision of licensed classifiers as he shall deem necessary under authority of the United States cotton futures act.

Sec. 2. Further to carry out the purposes of the said United States cotton standards act, the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to issue to any qualified person, upon presentation of satisfactory evidence of competency, a license to sample cotton. Any such license may be suspended or revoked by the Secretary of Agriculture whenever he is satisfied that such licensee is incompetent or has knowingly or carelessly sampled cotton improperly, or has violated any provision of said act or the regulations thereunder so far as the same may relate to him, or has used his license, or allowed it to be used, for any improper purpose. The license, or allowed it to be used, for any improper purpose. secretary of Agriculture may prescribe by regulation the condi-tions under which licenses may be issued hereunder, and may require any licensed sampler to give bond for the faithful per-formance of his duties and for the protection of persons affected thereby and may prescribe the conditions under which cotton shall be sampled by licensed samplers for the purpose of classifi-cation by officers of the Department of Agriculture, or by licensed cotton classifiers.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator in charge of this bill explain it?

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, there are certain rules and regulations now requiring these cotton traders to conform to certain very strict standards, and stand certain strict examinations. The result has been that the country at large is deprived of the services of those who are qualified to grade the cotton. The farmers lose thousands of dollars every year by having the buyers do the grading. This joint resolution is simply to enable the Secretary of Agriculture, upon evidence being given him that these persons are qualified, to license them to grade cotton.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if it is not true that the cotton people in my part of the country are suffering very greatly from Government interference in the way of graders and classifiers, and interference generally on the part of the Government with the cotton business?

Mr. SMITH. Oh, no, Mr. President!

Mr. McKELLAR. It seems to me we are going entirely too far. I looked up the records in my own town-which, of course, is a large cotton market—and I find that the Government has various officials there supervising every part of the business; and it seems to me this is just another addition to that.

Mr. SMITH. No; Mr. President, the Senator misunderstands this measure entirely. As the matter now stands, any community that has not a Government grader, when a farmer brings his cotton into market, has to depend upon the purchaser of the cotton to grade it. Fortunes have been made by men undergrading cotton and then regrading and selling it; whereas when the cotton is graded by an official of the Government, who has Government standards before him, it keeps the local buyer from penalizing or falsely grading the cotton.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the Senator mean to say that under the authority of this measure any community in the cotton territory will have a right to have classifiers and graders appointed? If so, how much is it going to cost the Government?

Mr. SMITH. Not a penny, because they grade the cotton, and those who sell the cotton pay from 5 to 10 cents a bale. It does not cost the Government a penny.

Mr. McKELLAR. There are no salaries attached to it? Mr. SMITH. There are no salaries attached to it at all. Mr. McKELLAR. Then, Mr. President, with the assurance that there will be no salaried employees of the Government under this measure, I will withdraw objection.

Mr. SMITH. I am the beneficiary myself of one of these graders at my platform.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DESERT-LAND ENTRYMEN

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 5664) to amend an act approved March 4, 1929 (45 Stat. 1548), entitled "An act to supplement the last three paragraphs of section 5 of the act of March 4, 1915 (38 Stat. 1161), as amended by the act of March 21, 1918 (40 Stat. 458)," which was read, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act approved March 4, 1929 (45 Stat. 1548), entitled "An act to supplement the last three paragraphs of section 5 of the act of March 4, 1915 (38 Stat. 1161), as amended by the act of March 21, 1918 (40 Stat. 458)," be amended to read as follows:

amended to read as follows:

"That where it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Interior with reference to any lawful pending desert-land entry made prior to July 1, 1925, under which the entryman or his duly qualified assignee under an assignment made prior to the date of this act has in good faith expended the sum of $3 per acre in the attempt to effect reclamation of the land, that there is no reasonable prospect that he would be able to secure water sufficient to effect reclamation of the irrigable land in his entry or any legal subdivision thereof, the Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion, allow such entryman or assignee 90 days from notice within which to pay to the register of the United States land office 25 cents an acre for the land embraced in the entry and to file an election to perfect title to the entry under the provisions of this act, and thereafter within one year from the date of filing of such elec-tion to pay to the register the additional amount of 75 cents an acre, which shall entitle him to a patent for the land: Provided, That in case the final payment be not made within the time prescribed the entry shall be canceled and all money theretofore paid shall be forfeited."

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (H. R. 2935) for the relief of J. R. Reimer was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (H. R. 7278) for the relief of Joseph Vigliotti was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay to Joseph Vigliotti, of Detroit, Mich., the sum of $1,500, being the amount of a bond deposited as security and filed with the inspector in charge of immigration at Detroit and later forfeited for alleged failure to produce certain aliens for deportation, the alleged failure being no fault of Joseph Vigliotti.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (H. R. 5214) for the relief of Withycombe Post, No. 11, American Legion, Corvallis, Oreg., was announced as next in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I see that the department recommends against this bill. I think it ought to go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

PETER BESS

The bill (H. R. 657) for the relief of Peter Bess was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Peter Bess, of West Springfield, Mass., the sum of $500, which sum represents the payment by him of a fine originally imposed in violation of the law by the United States district court of Massachusetts and subsequently revoked by an order of the said court on June 18, 1930: quently revoked by an order of the said court on June 18, 1930: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 per cent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 per cent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

ADA B. (GOULD) GOLLAN

The bill (H. R. 3694) for the relief of Ada B. (Gould) Gollan was considered by the Senate and was read as fol-

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay the sum of $576.41 to Ada B. (Gould) Gollan, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, said payment being the amount rightfully due to the said Ada B. (Gould) Gollan growing out of the disposition of the estate of Mary D. Gould, deceased (her stepmother), and which was paid into the Treasury of the United States at the close of the administration of said estate; and such payments shall relieve the said Secretary of the Treasury from any obligation to the said District of Columbia for the said sum of money so deposited: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 per cent thereof shall be paid or delivered by the said of the said sum of money so deposited: ered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 per cent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding. upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, this is another bill that the Treasury Department does not recommend, but it is a small matter.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOSEPH T. RYERSON & SON (INC.)

The bill (H. R. 10170) authorizing adjustment of the claim of Joseph T. Ryerson & Son (Inc.) was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as fol-

Be tt enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to adjust and settle the claim of Joseph T. Ryerson & Son (Inc.) for $135.08 on account of certain brass angles furnished to the Navy Department under contract No. N251s-16622, dated December 7, 1929, and to allow not exceeding $112.55 in full and final settlement of said claim. There is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $112.55, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for payment of said claim.

LAKE DENMARK (N. J.) AMMUNITION DEPOT CLAIMS

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 5444) to provide an additional appropriation as the result of a reinvestigation, pursuant to the act of February 2, 1929 (45 Stat. 2047, pt. 2), for the payment of claims of persons who suffered property damage, death, or personal injury due to the explosions at the naval ammunition depot, Lake Denmark, N. J., July 10, 1926, which was read as follows:

mark, N. J., July 10, 1926, which was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $14,090.55 be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States, to make payment of claims for property damage, death, or personal injury due to the explosions at the naval ammunition depot, Lake Denmark, N. J., July 10, 1926, to the respective persons and in the respective amounts as recommended by the Comptroller General of the United States and as fully set forth in House Document No. 716, Seventy-first Congress, third session, pursuant to the act of March 2, 1927 (44 Stat., pt. 3, p. 1800), and the act of February 2, 1929 (45 Stat., pt. 2, p. 2047). No part of the sums herein appropriated shall be paid to any insurance company or other indemnifier, nor shall any claimant be paid for the whole or that part of any claim for damages which has been paid to such claimant by an insurance company or other indemnifier. other indemnifier.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, there should be an explanation of this bill.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, these are claims which have been before the Comptroller General, and have his approval. There are already quite a number of claims of the same nature which have been presented, and this simply is designed to meet the payments.

Mr. McKELLAR. How was this amount ascertained?

Mr. CAPPER. It was ascertained by the Comptroller General.

Mr. McKELLAR. Was the matter referred by the Congress to the Comptroller General for report?

Mr. CAPPER. In the report it is stated:

The said claims have been examined by the Comptroller General and as a result he recommends that there now be appropriated, in addition to the amounts heretofore appropriated, the sum of $11,917.99 as the amount necessary to make payment of the claims $11,917.99 as the amount necessary to make payment of the claims so reinvestigated and recommended.

Pursuant to the act of March 2, 1927 (44 Stat. 1800, pt. 3), there are included in the bill two claims not heretofore reported to Congress, and the Comptroller General recommends that there now be appropriated the sum of $2,172.56, making a total of $14,090.55 required to be appropriated for all claims recommended for payment in the report of the Comptroller General.

A bill providing for the payment of these claims was introduced in the Seventy-first Congress, third session, but due to the late date of introduction no action was taken on that bill.

The report of the Comptroller General (H. Doc. No. 321, 71st Cong., 3d sess.), which is attached hereto, sets forth all of the facts with regard to these claims.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, the United States has the Picatinny Arsenal as its principal eastern storehouse for explosives, which is located in Morris County, N. J. and only a short distance away from the place mentioned in this bill. A few years ago a large part of the explosives stored at this arsenal blew up. No employee remained alive to explain the cause of the explosion. Houses, schools, and other buildings were greatly damaged. People were knocked down and injured within a radius of 8 miles from the place of the explosion. Many people in that vicinity lost all of their personal effects. The agents of the Government have never adequately compensated these people even for their material losses, let alone the distress and terror caused by the explosion.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DAMAGES CAUSED BY OVERFLOW OF THE RIO GRANDE

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 6774) to authorize amendment of the act of February 25, 1927, for the payment of damages caused by reason of the overflow of the Rio Grande on August 17, 1921, which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ESCHA WHITTINGTON CASEY

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 6381) for the relief of Escha Whittington Casey, which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ED SYMES

The bill (H. R. 3848) for the relief of Ed Symes and wife, Elizabeth Symes, and certain other citizens of the State of Texas, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

JOHN L. DUNN

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 973) for the relief of John L. Dunn, which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SADIE BERMI

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 7040) for the relief of Sadie Bermi, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, on page 1, line 4, to strike out "$2,500" and to insert in lieu thereof "$1,500," so as to read:

Be it enacted, etc., That there be paid, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,500 to Sadie Bermi, of St. Louis, Mo., to compensate her in full for all claims she may have against the United States arising out of injuries received by her from being struck by an automobile truck belonging to the United States Government in the city of St. Louis on the 2d day of February, 1928: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 per cent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 per cent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

GEORGE BEIER

The bill (H. R. 1206) for the relief of George Beier was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

EDWARD J. O'NEIL

The bill (H. R. 1203) for the relief of Edward J. O'Neil was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over. Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, House bill 1206 and House bill 1203 were called while I was out of the Chamber for a moment. What happened in the cases of those bills?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. They went over on objection of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, these cases were both dealt with by the Railroad Administration. There was a case known as the Snow case, in which it was decided that no compensation should be permitted after a certain time. That was set aside, and the Senator will find in the reports in both cases, on page 2 of the report in the case of George Beier, this statement from an official of the Railroad Administration:

We take the position that we were out of the case after the Snow decision and we have not followed it any further. I might say this, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me, from my knowledge of the facts here as a matter of equity, these men are entitled to compensation, that is what I mean; they have not any legal status, in my judgment they are out of court.

There can be no doubt of the moral obligation upon the Government, and the sum involved in each case is very small.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. WHITE. These were both cases where the men were permanently and totally disabled. In both cases the Compensation Commission of the State of New York awarded them compensation, and it was being paid up to the time of the decision in the Snow case. In the Snow case it was held that the provision of the transportation act which authorized suits against the Railroad Administration because of injuries arising during the Government operation of the railroads did not comprehend a proceeding under the compensation laws of the State of New York. fore the compensation which had been awarded in each case was stopped, and in the meantime all rights which either of the men might have had to proceed against the Government itself were lost. So that because of that decision of the court construing the transportation act, the man in each instance lost the award which had been agreed to, and had been decreed by the New York Compensation Commission.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, in the Beier case, I may say, the man was actually offered $5,000, but the New York State Compensation Commission would not permit him to receive it.

Mr. WHITE. The Senator is correct. In the Beier case there was an offer of settlement, but the referee of the New York Compensation Commission disapproved of the acceptance of the award, deeming it to be inadequate.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. KING. Were there any funds at any time, and are there any funds now, in the possession of the Railroad Administration or its successor, out of which any sum might be paid?

Mr. COPELAND. I can not answer that, in all frankness. Mr. WHITE. I know of no such funds. I think the money would come out of the Treasury, although I do not assert that with positiveness. My impression is that it would.

Mr. KING. My impression was that there was a reserve fund to meet contingent liabilities of the Railroad Administration, and, of course, if that is true, these payments should not come from the Treasury of the United States. From the statements of the Senators I am inclined to think that compensation ought to be awarded to these persons who were injured. The query in my mind is whether the Treasury of the United States ought to be amenable for the dereliction—if there were dereliction—of the Railroad Administration or its employees.

Mr. COPELAND. There is no question, from the testimony, about these cases. They were cases presented by my colleague, not by myself, but I read the testimony, and it was very clear that there was abundant reason for granting this relief.

Mr. KING. May I suggest this to the Senator from New York and to my friend the Senator from Maine: To let the bills be passed, but for them to inquire of the Treasury Department immediately, this evening or the first thing in the morning, and if it shall be found that there is a fund available out of which these payments could be made, then I will ask the Senator to-morrow morning to recur to these measures, have the votes reconsidered by which they were passed, and place them back on the calendar.

GEORGE BEIER

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York asks unanimous consent that the Senate recur to the consideration of House bill 1206, for the relief of George Beier.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EDWARD J. O'NEIL

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York asks unanimous consent that the Senate return to the consideration of House bill 1203, for the relief of Edward J. O'Neil. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BETHEL CEMETERY CO. AND OTHERS

The bill (H. R. 2217) for the relief of the Bethel Cemetery Co., the Presbyterian Church, Harold S. Stubbs, George Morgan, Edward Stapp, William J. Howard, David J. Seacord, Mary L. McIntire, Emma E. Foard, Herbert C. Hannigan, Sisters of St. Baisl, Edward Bedwell, and Rachel A. Loveless was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FRANCES SOUTHARD

The bill (H. R. 7038) for the relief of Frances Southard was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK, EL DORADO, ARK.

The bill (H. R. 8217) for the relief of the First National Bank of El Dorado, Ark., was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NATIONAL BANK OF COMMERCE, EL DORADO, ARK.

The bill (H. R. 8215) for the relief of the National Bank of Commerce, El Dorado, Ark., was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOWARD M'KEE

The bill (H. R. 6275) for the relief of Howard McKee was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DELLA O'BRIEN

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 7128) for the relief of Della O'Brien.

Mr. KING. May we have an explanation of that bill?
The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky
[Mr. Logan], who reported the bill, is not in the Chamber.
Mr. KING. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

C. A. CATES

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 2294) for the relief of C. A. Cates, which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN MOORE

The bill (H. R. 5947) for the relief of John Moore was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

JOHN I. LOWE

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 3626) for the relief of John I. Lowe, which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CAPT. GUY M. KINMAN

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 4773) for the relief of Capt. Guy M. Kinman, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, on page 1, line 7, to strike out "$2,405.70" and insert in lieu thereof "$1,582.70," so as to read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Guy M. Kinman, captain, United States Army, Washington, D. C., the sum of $1,582.70, in full satisfaction of his loss on account of damage by water to his household goods on August 18, 1931, while temporarily in authorized storage in a Government warehouse at Fort Meyer, Va., in connection with authorized change of station.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, there have been quite a number of cases similar to this in which claims have been made against the Government for the loss of property owned by officers of the Army and the Navy. It seems to me that there should be no obligation upon the part of the Government for a large amount of personal property owned by officers when fires occur, perhaps not upon the property of the Government. It occurs to me that officers, if they are carrying with them a large amount of goods, household effects and other things, ought to have the same insured. If a Senator or a Representative or a judge is traveling around the country, bringing household effects to Washington and they are destroyed by fire or by the railroad, obviously there is no obligation on the part of the Government. It may be that a different rule should apply to Army and Navy officers, but I am unable to see why the Government should be responsible for the losses of property of officers of the Army and the Navy under circumstances such as are indicated in this bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, this is for household goods, which were in charge of the quartermaster. The quartermaster did not deliver the household goods when he should have delivered them, and they were ruined by flood in the warehouse where they were stored. The officer has no other household effects with which to go to housekeeping, and this measure is to reimburse him for his loss.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JACK SCHNEIDER

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, at the instance of the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. Steiwer] I report favorably from the Committee on Claims House bill 2757, for the relief of Jack Schneider, and file a report thereon (No. 1366). It is necessary, since the bill has been amended by the committee, that it be acted on at once, in the hope that it may get over to the House of Representatives this evening for action there. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be taken up at once.

Mr. KING. Let the bill be reported.

The bill had been reported from the committee with an amendment, on page 1, line 6, to strike out "$3,750" and to insert in lieu thereof "$3,459.25," so as to read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Jack Schneider the sum of $3,459.25, in full settlement of all claims by reason of personal injuries to and damage to, being the cost of an airplane, the property of said Jack Schneider, described as a fleet training ship, Government license No. NC-705-V, while making a forced landing in a ravine in the Sierra Nevada Mountains, about 18 miles west of Independence, Calif.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will not the Senator from California explain this?

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, the bill is this. In the most inaccessible part of the Sierra Nevada Mountains a year or more ago four men met with an accident. One was killed, and three were there helpless. It was absolutely essential that there should be transported to them such drugs and medicines as were necessary for the protection of the three still living.

Jack Schneider was an airplane pilot in the city of Fresno. He was asked by the authorities to take the necessary medicines and other supplies out to those men, and it was an emergency, an urgent job. Schneider made the flight. He dropped the supplies for the men in question, and as he flew up and got to about 11,000 feet, something happened, and his plane crashed. He was not himself hurt, but his plane was ruined, and this measure is for his relief. That is the story.

Mr. REED. It is a very meritorious case, but why should the United States Government pay the bill?

Mr. JOHNSON. The men who were injured were all employees of the Forest Service, and it was at the request of those in charge that Schneider flew out with the supplies.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill. to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

WILLIAM J. FLEMING

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I report favorably from the Committee on Claims House bill 7301, for the relief of William J. Fleming, and ask for immediate consideration.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the United States Employees' Compensation Commission is hereby authorized to consider and determine sation Commission is hereby authorized to consider and determine the claim of William J. Fleming, on account of injuries sustained liy him while employed by the Air Nitrates Corporation at Muscle Shoals, Aia., in the year 1918, in the same manner and to the same extent as if said William J. Fleming had made application for the benefits of the act entitled "An act to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injuries while in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes," approved September 7, 1916, as amended, within the 1-year period required by sections 17 and 20 thereof: Provided, That no benefits shall accrue prior to the approval of this act.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, in my opinion this is not a valid claim against the Government. If this man was injured away back in 1918, if there was any liability upon the part of the Government, he ought to have presented his claim long prior to this. Obviously after 14 years have passed, if the Government had a defense, if the corporation had a defense, it would be very difficult to assert it now because witnesses may have died or moved away. It places the Government at a very great disadvantage. I think it is unfair to the Government if we are to permit suits to be brought against the Government by extending the statute of limitations 10 or 15 or 20 years after the alleged accident. A municipal corporation is not subjected to a situation such as that and neither is the Government.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator object? Mr. KING. I withhold my objection for a moment to hear from the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, may I state that this is a case exactly in line with numerous bills which have been passed by the Senate. It does not place any liability upon the Government of itself. It simply gives to this man, who has lost his leg, the right to present his claim before the properly appointed tribunal of the United States. Not only that, but, if he does not present his claim, instead of the Government's being injured, the Government would be benefited if he has a just claim, because the Government would not have been required to pay him the compensation which he should have received during the time he has not presented the claim for the reason that the bill provides on its face that even the board can not award him any compensation which has accrued previous to this time.

I invite the Senator's attention to the fact that we have passed a number of bills of this kind and they have passed the House. There is not the slightest doubt on earth that the bill will pass in the next session of Congress.

Mr. KING. I think this is very unfair to the Government. The Senator says there are a number of cases analogous to this. If there are, they have not been brought to my attention. I shall not object to this bill, but I feel that in any other case I am not going to consent when I am in the Chamber to waiving the statute of limitations in this way. I think it is unfair to the Government, years and years after an alleged injury, when the Government is deprived of the opportunity of meeting the charge of negligence, to remove the statute of limitations and permit actions of this character.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AGRICULTURAL ENTRY OF MINERAL LANDS

The bill (H. R. 13745) to provide for agricultural entry of lands withdrawn, classified, or reported as containing any of the minerals subject to disposition under the general leasing law or acts amendatory thereof or supplementary thereto was announced as next in order.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I am under the impression that this is a bill which the Senator from North

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill | Dakota [Mr. Nye] asked to have passed over. May it be passed over temporarily until he returns to the Chamber?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over temporarily.

Mr. JOHNSON subsequently said: Mr. President, I asked that a bill, the last on the calendar, Order of Business 1464, House bill 13745, be passed over when it was called, because I thought a request had been made by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. Nye] to defer action upon it. I was in error about the bill; and therefore, because I did an injustice in relation to it, the Senator from North Dakota now being here, I ask unanimous consent that we may return to

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have no objection to returning to the bill, but I do not want to have it considered until the bill now under consideration is disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read the bill for the information of the Senate.

The legislative clerk read the bill (H. R. 13745) to provide for agricultural entry of lands withdrawn, classified, or reported as containing any of the minerals subject to disposition under the general leasing law or acts amendatory thereof or supplementary thereto, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That lands withdrawn, classified, or reported as valuable for sodium and/or sulphur and subject to prospecting, leasing, or development under the general leasing act of February 25, 1920, or acts amendatory thereof or supplementary thereto, shall be subject to appropriation, location, selection, entry, or purchase if otherwise available in the form and manner and subject to the reservations, provisions, limitations, and conditions of the act of Congress approved July 17, 1914 (38 Stat. L. 509; U. S. C., title 30, sec. 123): Provided, however, That lands lying within the geologic structure of a field, or withdrawn, classified, or rethe geologic structure of a heid, or withdrawn, classified, or reported as valuable for any of the minerals named herein and/or in any of said acts, or upon which leases or prospecting permits have been applied for or granted, for the production of any of such minerals, shall not be subject to such appropriation, location, selection, entry, or purchase unless it shall be determined by the Secretary of the Interior that such disposal will not unreasonably interfere with operations under said leasing acts. ably interfere with operations under said leasing acts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill?

Mr. SMOOT. If it does not lead to any discussion, I shall

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is objection, it will not be taken up. Is there objection?

Mr. SMOOT. I want the bill to be taken up, but I do not want it considered if it is to displace the bill now under consideration or take any time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator knows it will not displace the pending bill. Does the Senator object to it? Mr. SMOOT. No.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HARVEY COLLINS

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to return to calendar No. 1326, the bill (H. R. 2213) for the relief of Harvey Collins.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs with an amendment, on page 1, line 8, after the word "provided," to strike out "that no pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act" and to insert in lieu thereof "that no compensation, retirement pay, back pay, pension, or other benefit shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers Harvey Collins, late of the United States Navy, shall hereafter be deemed to have been discharged under honorable conditions from the naval service of the United States: Provided, That no compensation, retirement pay, back pay, pension, or other benefit shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

WITHYCOMBE POST, NO. 11. AMERICAN LEGION

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 1442, the bill (H. R. 5214) for the relief of Withycombe Post, No. 11, American Legion, Corvallis, Oreg. I am advised that the bill went over at the request of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], who propounded to my colleague a question which he was unable to answer. I would like to make a statement in connection with the matter if that is the desire of the Senator from

Mr. KING. I did not object to the bill. If the RECORD so shows it is in error. I have read the report and have no

Mr. STEIWER. Then I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $957.78 to the Withycombe Post, No. 11, American Legion, of Corvallis, Oreg.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I want to ask about Calendar No. 1273. May I have the attention of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] and the Senator from Utah [Mr. Krng]? This is the citizenship bill. I wish it might be passed. I have been spoken to to-day by a dozen Senators about it, and I think we ought to take it up. I ask unanimous consent that we recur to Calendar No. 1273.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, may I inquire if we have finished the call of the calendar?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, there are several bills not on the printed calendar but on the clerk's desk, sent here from the House, and we ought to pass on them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the

WILLIAM N. FISHBURN

The bill (H. R. 7986) for the relief of William N. Fishburn was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers William N. Fishburn, who was a member of Company D, Fifth Regiment United States Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a member of that organization on the 18th day of October, 1903, and notwithstanding any provisions to the contrary in the act relating to pension approved April 26, 1898, as amended by the act approved May 11, 1908: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BLAINE. Let me inquire as to the parliamentary situation. Has the call of the calendar been concluded?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The call of the printed calendar has been concluded.

Mr. BLAINE. I am anxious to have the attention of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKellar] with respect to Calendar 1435, the District banking bill.

Mr. KING. That went over on objection.

Mr. BLAINE. I would like to have it taken up and

The PRESIDING OFFICER. May the Chair suggest that it be called up later when the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKellar] returns to the Chamber?

Mr. BLAINE. Very well.

GEORGE OCCHIONERO

Mr. SCHUYLER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to recur to Calendar 1327, the bill (H. R. 9231) for the relief of George Occhionero, which presents a most meritorious and exceptional situation, approved by the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I do not object to that case. I have read the report and I agree with the Senator that it is a meritorious case; but under the unanimous consent entered into I am not sure that we are not contravening our own agreement.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I can assure the Senator from Utah that we may go beyond that consent by another consent agreement. That is the situation now existing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint George Occhionero, former first lieutenant, United States Marine Corps, in which grade he served honorably during the World War, now a gunnery sergeant in the United States Marine Corps, and to retire him and place him on the retired list of the United States Marine Corps as a marine gunner with retired pay of that grade, in accordance with the provisions of existing law for the retirement of officers of the Marine Corps, in case a retiring board should find him incapacitated for active service, and that his incapacity is the result of an incident of service. result of an incident of service.

SOUND-REPRODUCTION RECORDS FOR THE ABULT BLIND

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 1346, the bill (H. R. 13817) to amend section 1 of the act entitled "An act to provide books for the adult blind," approved March 3, 1931.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I do not know what is about to happen. There is so much confusion in the Chamber I could not hear the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I have moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar 1346.

Mr. McNARY. Let me tell the able Senator from Utah that that would have the effect of displacing the unfinished business. Will not the Senator ask unanimous consent to return to it?

Mr. SMOOT. I asked unanimous consent, and it was refused. It is a bill to provide records for those who can not read by the Braille system and merely because two Braille manufacturers in the United States think that this is going to deprive them of a little business, they are objecting to the bill. That is all there is to it.

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President, I am tremendously interested in this bill. When it came up before the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] said he had a strong letter objecting to the manufacture of these records. In the first place, it is entirely optional with Mr. Putnam, Librarian of Congress, as to whether the powers authorized in the bill shall be availed of. He does not have to use it unless it is necessary. It is a fact, as I have checked this up with several experts, that at least three-fourths of the blind people of the country can never learn to use the Braille system because they have acquired their blindness too late in life so that their fingers are not sensitive enough to enable them to use that system.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I renew my motion to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to proceeding to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the superintendent of the State school for the blind in Wisconsin, an institution supported and operated by the State, desired that there should be an opportunity for a hearing on this bill. I so notified the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF], and a hearing was had, but it came at a time when there was very little opportunity to give notice of it. I am not criticizing the chairman of the committee at all. He has been endeavoring to get a quorum of the committee, but it was impossible to do so. He finally had to call a hearing on the bill on very short notice.

I am frank to say I have not made an investigation of the matter, but as I understand it the Government of the United States appropriates a certain sum of money each year to be spent in order that the Library of Congress may print books for the purpose of providing the blind, who are accustomed to using the Braille system, with reading material. It is proposed under the terms of this bill to spend a certain amount of money, whatever may be necessary in the judgment of Mr. Putnam, for the purpose of turning out | what might be termed phonograph records, or at least records produced under a somewhat similar process, in order, as it is claimed by the sponsors of the bill, that those who are not trained in using their fingers in reading the Braille system may have literature coming to them through their ears by means of a phonograph record.

The objection as given to me by the State superintendent of the school for the blind in Wisconsin, who is a man who has devoted his life largely to the education of the blind, is that in the first place there are many persons who are not equipped with proper reproducing machinery to use these records; and, in the second place, the funds now provided for the publication of books in Braille type are too limited, and more money instead of less should be provided in order to furnish literature and other reading material for the blind. Their objection is that they do not want that already inadequate sum diverted, in part, to the manufacture of these records. It is an untried process. As I said at the beginning, in the pressure of this session I have had no opportunity to make an investigation of this matter, but those who are opposed to the measure desire an opportunity to be heard. Through no fault of the chairman, notice of the hearing came on very short notice; they were unable to be present. Therefore, I have objected to this bill being taken up, because, not, as the Senator from Utah intimates, that I have received some objection from some publishers-I have not-but I have received objections from the superintendent of the State school for the blind, who is absolutely disinterested: he has devoted his life to this work; and I believe that the point of view he represents is entitled to consideration before the committee. That viewpoint has not been presented.

Now, in the closing hours of the session, the Senator from Utah wants to have the bill passed. Everyone knows that we are going to have an extraordinary session very shortly; and I think this measure should go over, that it should have more deliberate consideration, and that those who disagree with the position taken by the Senator from Utah and the Senator from Connecticut should have an opportunity fully to present their case. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin objects to the consideration of the bill. Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13817) to amend section 1 of the act entitled "An act to provide books for the adult blind," approved March 3, 1931.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Utah. [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask for a division on my motion.

On a division, the motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1 of the act entitled "An act to provide books for the adult blind," approved March 3, 1931, is amended by adding after the words "books," the following: "published either in raised characters, on sound-reproduction records, or in any other form."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I suggest the absence of a quorum. Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President-

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I withhold the suggestion.

REGULATION OF BANKING IN THE DISTRICT

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, it is necessary for me to leave the Senate Chamber. I am very anxious to recur, if it may be done by unanimous consent, to Order of Business 1435, being House bill 6402, to regulate banking in the District of Columbia. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKellarl previously asked that the bill go over, but he has since withdrawn his objection.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection to the consideration of the bill if it shall not displace the pending measure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will not displace the pending measure if it be considered by unanimous consent.

Mr. KING. May I state that that bill had the unanimous approval of the District Committee; and the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER], a few moments ago expressed his very great desire to have the bill passed. I hope it may be passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKellar] had objected to the bill.

Mr. KING. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE] has just stated that the Senator from Tennessee has withdrawn his objection to it.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 6402) to further regulate banking, banks, trust companies, and building and loan associations in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I ask that the Senator from Wisconsin give us a short explanation of the bill.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, the bill does four things. Under the present law in the District of Columbia any banking organization chartered by any State may come into the District without obtaining a charter from the Comptroller of the Currency, who has charge of granting charters to banks in the District. The District of Columbia ought to be accorded the same treatment as the respective States receive. This bill will require a foreign corporation which intends to engage in the banking business in the District to take out a charter under the jurisdiction of the Comptroller of the Currency.

Mr. NORRIS. Does not the present law require that?

Mr. BLAINE. It does not.

Mr. NORRIS. Is there any limitation?
Mr. BLAINE. The only limitation is that the Comptroller of the Currency may examine such a banking institution under the general law that applies to this country as a whole.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of April 26, 1922 (42 Stat. L. pt. 1, p. 500; D. C. Code, title 5, sec. 300), be amended to read as

SOUND REPRODUCTION FOR THE ADULT BLIND

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13817) to amend section 1 of the act entitled "An act to provide books for the adult blind," approved March 3, 1931.

Mr. COPELAND. I ask unanimous consent to take up Order of Business 1273, being the bill (H. R. 8174) to exempt

United States citizens.

Mr. SMOOT. There is a bill now pending. Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I must insist on better order in the Chamber. I do not know what is the request of the Senator from New York.

Mr. COPELAND. I have asked that Order of Business 1273 may now be considered.

Mr. SMOOT. I must object for the present, because there is a bill now before the Senate.

Mr. COPELAND. I shall not, of course, interfere with the bill of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. McNARY. Does the Senator from New York ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill which he has named?

Mr. COPELAND. Yes; but I understand the Senator from Utah has a bill before the Senate, and I do not wish to interfere with that bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill has been read.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I suggest the absence of a quorum. The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll. The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following

AGRICULTURAL RELIEF ALLOTMENT BILL

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I have no objection whatever to the pending bill and I can see no logical reason why it should not be passed. I was for it when it was previously before the Senate. However, I have waited very patiently to say a few words on the agricultural situation and I do not want the Seventy-second Congress finally to adjourn without expressing my views on that question.

At this time when the farmers are in the most difficult plight in which they have ever been in the history of our country, the Congress is about to close without doing a single thing for the permanent benefit of the American farmer.

The first session of the present Congress was the first time in the history of Congress, so far as I know, when the leaders of the three great farm organizations got together unanimously in behalf of a bill for the benefit of agriculture. At that session they agreed upon what was known as the allotment bill. It was not passed at that session. Again at the beginning of the present session they agreed on the bill. Hearings on it were held in the House before the Committee on Agriculture, and the bill, providing what is known as the allotment plan, backed by the three great farm organizations, was reported to the House. There it was amended considerably, the amendments taking a great deal of merit out of the bill. It finally passed the House. It came to the Senate and was referred to the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. That committee held hearings upon the bill. It was to some extent modified and clarified, in order to make it more understandable and, I believe, more workable. The number of farm products included in the bill as passed by the House was reduced, so that it covered only wheat and cotton for the present year, 1933. The bill was reported to the Senate and placed on the calendar a from the quota fathers and mothers over 60 years of age of | few days ago, but there has been no chance to get any consideration of it.

In the last message of President Hoover a statement was made by him that he was opposed to the allotment bill. Many of us here, however, differed from the President; and, in fact, at the election last November there were several million voters throughout the Nation who disagreed with the President.

It has been impossible to get consideration of the allotment bill, although it simply provides as to the principal farm products that a price based on pre-war prices shall be paid for the amount of those products used for domestic consumption.

I believe the bill would have been a great benefit to the farmers of the country if passed. It does not go far enough, in my opinion. I had an amendment ready to offer on the floor to provide that the amount of the tariff should be added to the pre-war price fixed in the bill. I am firmly of the opinion that we never will get out of this horrible depression we are in until something is done to put agriculture on a business basis, until something is done to give the farmers the cost of production and a fair profit for their products, until something is done to restore the purchasing power of our American farmers.

The allotment bill would have gone a long way in that direction. Personally, I have been of the opinion that the emergency that exists at the present time is sufficient to warrant Congress to declare that an emergency exists, just as was done in the World War period, and to pass a bill fixing the prices of farm products, based on cost of production and a fair profit to the farmer, at least for the amount of those products used for home consumption.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks the report on the socalled allotment bill made by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The report is as follows:

[Senate Report No. 1251, Seventy-second Congress, second session] AGRICULTURAL RELIEF

Mr. Frazier, from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, submitted the following report (to accompany H. R. 13991)

The Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 13991) to aid agriculture and relieve the existing national economic emergency, having considered the same, reports thereon with amendments, with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

SERIOUS CONDITION OF AGRICULTURE

Extended hearings were held upon the proposed legislation, both by the House committee and this committee.

The distressed condition of agriculture and the importance, from the standpoint of general economic recovery, of restoring to normal the purchasing power of the farmer, are too well known to require lengthy discussion.

Prices for all farm products average to-day about half what they were before the World War. On the other hand, taxes per acre on agricultural lands are about twice what they were before the war, and farm indebtedness has increased approximately 150 per cent. Agricultural freight rates are more than 50 per cent in excess of pre-war freight rates excess of pre-war freight rates.

We produce exportable surpluses of cotton, wheat, and a number of other major farm commodities. No direct tariff can place such commodities on a basis of equality with industrial products that for many years have had the benefit of tariff protection. Agricultural tariffs have almost without exception proved ineffective. Yet tariff rates on industrial articles which the farmer buys, and the cost of such articles to him, have greatly advanced. The result has been that the producers of agricultural commodities must bear much of the burden of the tariff without receiving its advantages. advantages.

AGRICULTURAL RELIEF

While the average prices received by farmers for products sold by them in January of this year was 49 per cent below the pre-war average, the prices of commodities bought by him were 5 per war average, the prices of commodities bought by him were 5 per cent above the pre-war average. Consequently, the purchasing power of farm products in the first month of 1933 was less than one-half what it was in the pre-war period. This loss of purchasing power has had a most serious effect upon industry in general through the inability of farmers to buy industrial products, Moreover, it has deprived the farmer of his ability to meet his indebtedness, a large part of which was contracted when prices of farm products were several times their present level. It is obvious, therefore, that an increase in prices and income of farmers is necessary. BILL WOULD HELP TO RESTORE AGRICULTURAL PURCHASING POWER

The present measure is aimed at restoring agricultural purchasing power by affording benefits to producers of two major agricultural commodities—wheat and cotton.

Many measures have been proposed for relieving the existing condition of agriculture, and it is not, of course, to be expected that there will be unanimous agreement among all interested persons as to the best method to follow. It is also apparent that this condition can not be remedied by any one measure. However, the present bill will aid in bringing about a better balance in national purchasing power, will result in a reduction of the number of unemployed, will aid in reestablishing the purchasing power of labor and other consumers, as well as of agriculture, and will bein to meet the present patients!

will help to meet the present national emergency.

It has become clear that the situation in agriculture is now so It has become clear that the situation in agriculture is now so serious that we can not rely on normal economic curative reactions. While the principle that agriculture is entitled to a fair purchasing power should be a permanent part of our national policy, the present legislation is proposed as a temporary means for effectuating that principle and is by the bill placed into effect only as to the crops produced in 1933. The operation of the provisions of the bill may, by proclamation of the President, be extended for an additional year with respect to either commodity. The continuance of the measure beyond such time will be left to the subsequent determination of Congress.

ADJUSTMENT CERTIFICATES

In order to afford the producers of wheat and cotton a pre-war return for their commodities, provision is made for the issuance of adjustment certificates to producers of the commodities. These certificates will be in a face amount equal to the difference becertificates will be in a face amount equal to the difference between the price being paid producers at local markets and the pre-war price for the commodity, less a small deduction to take care of administrative costs. Certificates will, however, cover only so much of the year's crop as the Secretary of Agriculture determines will be required for domestic consumption. In other words, any exportable surplus produced will not be entitled to benefits under the act. The American farmer will, however, be given benefits in the domestic market.

The certificates will be issued to the producer by local representatives of the Department of Agriculture upon satisfactory proof that he is entitled thereto. The certificates are negotiable, and redeemable at any time within a year of issuance. Certificates will be accepted for redemption at the United States Treasury or other fiscal agencies designated by the Secretary of the Treasury.

COSTS UNDER THE BILL

Amounts sufficient to pay the benefits to producers provided for In the bill are to be realized from the adjustment charges to be paid on the processing of the commodities covered, and the cost of administration is taken care of by reducing by 2½ per cent the benefits which would otherwise be payable to producers.

The benefits granted are so fixed as to correspond with the ad-

The benefits granted are so made as to be justment charges to be paid.

The adjustment charge to be collected on processing is to be in an amount equal to the difference between the price paid producers at local markets and the pre-war price of the commodity. Adjustment charges are to be paid in respect of processing of inverted quantities of the commodities, as well as those of domestic production.

Exemption from the payment of processing charges is provided for in the case of processing by the producer for consumption on his own farm.

INCIDENTAL REVENUE PROVISIONS

By reason of the provisions for adjustment charges it was found desirable to include incidental provisions providing for—

(1) An adjustment charge on the processing of silk or rayon.

(2) A floor stock tax upon articles processed from wheat or cotton, and held for sale at the time the adjustment charge goes into effect or is increased. This provision is to prevent stimulation of processing for the purpose of avoiding payment of adjustment charges, and of preventing discriminations between processors. Refunds of the tax are provided in the case of termination or decrease in the adjustment charge. This tax will not apply to persons engaged solely in retail trade, except that a retailer is to be taxed on flour in excess of 25 barrels held for sale. sale.

(3) Processing in bond for exportation, without the payment of adjustment charges; and the refund of adjustment charges paid in respect of products exported.

(4) Payment by the vendee of the adjustment charges and taxes in cases where existing contracts covering articles in respect of which such charges or taxes are imposed do not permit the addition to the amount to be paid under the contract of the charge or tax.

(5) The abatement or refund of adjustment charges in respect of any amount of a commodity used in the manufacture of products which are of such low value that the imposition of the adjustment charge would prevent the use of the commodity in the manufacture of such products.

(6) An import duty of 5 cents per pound in the case of importation of short-staple cotton, this commodity now being subject to no import duty; an import duty in the case of articles contain-ing short-staple cotton; and import duties on articles processed or manufactured from any commodity which if domestically processed would be subject to an adjustment charge.

PROTECTION FOR CONSUMERS

The measure gives protection to the interests of the consumer. The adjustment charge levied on the processor and to be passed on to the consumer is in no case to represent more than the difference between the prevailing local market price and the pre-war price of the commodity. This means that the measure can ence between the prevailing local market price and the prewar price of the commodity. This means that the measure can not be used by the agricultural interests to force consumers to pay a higher price to farmers than was the case before the war.

Evidence introduced before the committee indicates that the retail prices of the products concerned need not be greatly advanced by the imposition of the adjustment charges. With wheat prices as they are this winter there is only about a half cent's worth of wheat in a 16-ounce loaf, and the imposition of the maximum tax on wheat should at most increase the price of such a loaf by less than a cent. Since 1929 the price of bread in the United States has declined by only 25 per cent, whereas the price of wheat has declined by 68 per cent. It is not generally understood how much the price of wheat could advance without greatly increasing the cost of bread to the consumer. In 1913 bread prices were about the same as now, but wheat was more than twice as high. In the case of cotton and cotton goods, consumers will be interested to learn what a small percentage of the retail price is represented by what the farmer gets. For example, doubling the present price of cotton would increase the price of volle, which now sells for 7 cents a yard, by half a cent and the price of a cotton shirt which now sells for a dollar by 2 cents.

The adjustment charges will undoubtedly cost the consumer money, but this money will promptly be spent by the farmer in ways which will decrease unemployment and add to the profits of business. Moreover, consumers must remember that in the long run they can not expect to buy any product at a price which represents less them. which represents less than a fair return to labor and capital. The ultimate danger to the consumer in present extremely low prices is that after agriculture is entirely ruined it will be necessary to pay unduly high prices before agriculture can be rehabilitated. The consumer as well as the farmer and the business man would benefit from a fair and balanced relationship between our productive forces. our productive forces.

AMENDMENTS BY COMMITTEE

From the foregoing explanation it will be noted that the bill as here reported differs in a number of respects from the bill as it passed the House.

It is recognized that the measure is experimental in that it operates upon principles which, though believed to be sound, have operates upon principles which, though believed to be sound, have not been tried before in Federal legislation. In view of this the committee believes that it is desirable to put the measure into operation in a manner involving a minimum of complexity. Later, if experience warrants it, the measure may be enlarged and extended. It seems to the committee that the bill as it passed the House was too complicated and included too many commodities to permit of its successful operation, especially for the present year, and the amendments made by the committee have for their purpose, primarily, the simplification of the bill. The most important of the amendments have the following effects:

(1) The operation of the measure is confined to wheat and

(1) The operation of the measure is confined to wheat and cotton. While it would be desirable to extend the direct benefits provided by the bill to producers of all commodities, it is not believed practicable to attempt to do so in view of its experimental character, the shortness of time, and the administrative difficulties which would be involved. It is believed necessary to limit the scope of the measure in order to give it a fair chance to operate successfully.

(2) The acreage control provisions are eliminated. The reasons for this are

First, attempts to limit production by the control of acreage as provided in the House bill would be in large part ineffective even if a substantial number of farmers agreed to reduce acreage. Acreage planted is only in part a determining factor of total productive productions of the control of the control of total productions. age planted is only in part a determining factor of total production. Weather and growing conditions generally, beyond the farmer's control, cause large variations in total output. Under the House provision it would have been possible, especially in important cotton-producing sections, to increase the yield per acre, substantially if not fully offsetting the reduction in acreage. Second, the administration of the acreage control features, in the opinion of this committee, would have resulted in serious complications and possibly unsurmountable difficulties. The former plications and possibly unsurmountable difficulties. The farmer would have been subjected to restrictions and regulations of such a character as to constitute a serious handicap to the administration of the plan as a whole. It is deemed advisable, therefore, to leave it to the individual farmer to determine the adjustments in production on his farm.

Third it is believed that the bill as amended will result in Third, it is believed that the bill as amended will result in a substantial measure of production control even without the requirements as to acreage reductions. Distinction should be made quirements as to acreage reductions. Distinction should be made between production control by avoiding stimulation of production and production control through uniform curtailment of acreage. The increased returns under this measure will accrue to the farmer through benefit payments only on that portion of his output which represents his share of domestic requirements. It appears improbable, therefore, that the elimination of the acreage curtailment feature of the House bill will result in stimulation of total output, especially under present conditions of extremely low prices of farm products in relation to the farmers' overhead costs. (3) Benefits are to be paid upon the basis of the crop produced rather than, as in the House bill, upon the amounts marketed, and certificates will be issued after harvesting. This will make for more orderly marketing and prevent the producer who is unable readily to market his commodity from suffering a disadvan-In order not to eliminate the incentive to market, however, 25 per cent of the benefit payment will be withheld until the farmer has marketed an amount of his crop equal to that part farmer has marketed an amount of his crop equal to that part upon which his certificate is issued.

(4) The basis for determining the amount of benefits paid is simplified. The "fair exchange value" specified in the House bill was based on the policy of maintaining for the future the same relationship between farm prices and the prices of industrial articles the farmer buys that existed in the pre-war period. The committee has substituted the simpler basis of the average price received in the United States by producers of the commodity at local markets during the base period from August, 1909, to July, 1914. The element of relationship to prices of industrial commodities has been eliminated.

(5) The producer will realize upon his certificate at any time commodities has been eliminated.

(5) The producer will realize upon his certificate at any time within a year after issuance. Under the House bill the certificate was to be issued in two equal parts, and the producer would have had to wait one month before realizing on one part and six months longer before realizing on the second part.

(6) The initial marketing period is eliminated. This is required by reason of the change which makes benefits no longer payable upon actual marketing but upon the harvested crop.

(7) The provision for a duty on animal, marine, and vegetable oils and fats is eliminated. This action was not taken because the committee is definitely opposed to it, but because it was believed unwise to approve it in its present form without further consideration. It was inserted on the floor of the House, not being in the bill as reported from the House committee.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, not only must the prices of farm products be raised so that the farmer will be enabled to pay his running expenses, his taxes, his interest, and installments on loans where he has loans, but we must have a lower rate of interest for farm indebtedness. We must have easier terms of payment. If the farmer is going to continue as a homeowner and landowner in this Nation of ours, we must have some measure of that kind passed by Congress. There are several bills pending before committees of Congress now to provide a lower rate of interest and easier terms of payment; and I still have hopes that in the special session, which I understand will be called in the near future, enough sentiment can be aroused to pass legislation of that kind-legislation to refinance the farmers at a lower rate of interest and on easier terms of payment; legislation that will give the farmers, for the percentage of their products used for home consumption, a price based on cost of production and a fair profit.

Mr. President, unless something of this kind is done, in my opinion our so-called depression will continue to go from bad to worse. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. Lewis] this afternoon made some criticism of the bankers of the Nation. putting part of the responsibility for the present conditions upon the bankers. I agree with the Senator from Illinois in what he said during his very illuminating address this afternoon; but, in view of that fact, the present Congress has passed laws providing for assistance and more power to the bankers. It has passed laws for the assistance of the great insurance companies, the railroads, and other business enterprises of the Nation, but has failed to do anything of a permanent nature for American agriculture, the very foundation upon which our Government is built.

Mr. President, it is useless to go into details about the farm situation. As I stated previously, the present condition is the worst we have ever had. The present prices of farm products are so low that the farmer can not get cost of production, can not pay running expenses for the prices he receives for his products. Farmers have been forced to organize all over the country in what are known as holiday movements or strike movements. Call them anything you like, Mr. President, but the farmers are organizing as they never have organized before. They have been forced to organize to protect their homes, to protect their families; and, after all is said and done, "self-preservation is the first law of nature."

I do not blame the farmers for organizing. As I stated on the floor of the Senate a few days ago, the one hopeful sign that I see for American agriculture to-day is the fact that the farmers have organized to protect themselves. They are organizing—yes; if you please, taking the law into their own hands-to protect their own homes and their neighbors' homes. It is the one hopeful sign that I see, because when the farmers have organized strongly enough there is no question about the result. They will come to Congress and demand legislation and get legislation for their benefit that has not been given them by Congresses in the past. Although they have had promise after promise in every national campaign in recent years by the leaders of both the old parties and their platforms that something would be done for agriculture, that agriculture would be put on a parity with industry, it never has been done; but, in my opinion, it will be done before we are out of this depression.

So. Mr. President, I am strongly of the belief that something must and will be done for agriculture in the coming special session; and I assure the leaders on the other side of the Chamber that I shall be willing to support any logical farm measure for the benefit of agriculture. Unless something is done in the coming special session conditions will go from bad to worse. The farmers will organize more strongly, and, I am satisfied, will take control of the agricultural situation for themselves unless Congress gives them the needed assistance.

Mr. President, among the refinancing bills is one that I introduced myself, known as S. 1197. Up to date 14 State legislatures have memorialized Congress to pass that bill. The bill has had favorable consideration by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. At this session it has been before the Committee on Banking and Currency. Hearings were held. The committee has not reported the bill because of certain opposition to it, but I still hope that it can be passed at the special session that will be called in the near future.

Mr. President, I simply wanted to take these few minutes to express my regret that the Seventy-second Congress, which is about to close, has not taken any permanent action for the benefit of the farmer. There is great disappointment on that account throughout the agricultural States; and I can not blame the farmers and others interested in agriculture for criticizing the Congress because they have not passed proper legislation to take care of the situation.

I will take no more time, Mr. President; but I assure the Senate that those representing the agricultural States are going to continue this fight, and in the special session we hope to get legislation that will be worth while, legislation that will be a real benefit to the American farmers.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. Frazier] correctly states the situation as to conditions in the West, and also expresses my feelings of disappointment in the fact that we have not obtained the necessary legislation for the relief of that section of the country.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Record a short excerpt from a letter from William Siefert, R. F. D. No. 3, Leavenworth, Kans., and a petition which he circulated among his farmer neighbors, and to which he received 104 signatures.

I hope that every Senator will read the petition. It is short. It is specific. It may ask an impossible thing-an interest rate of 11/2 per cent per annum on farm mortgages, and these to be taken over by the Government. But, Mr. President, this Congress will end next Saturday; it has spent the winter here, and what it has not done seems to me more incomprehensible than what this Kansas farmer asks to have done. So far as results go, this Congress has done nothing to meet the situation that faces the farmers of this country, the unemployed of this country, the industry of this country, the business interests of this country.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the letter and petition will lie on the table and be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

LEAVENWORTH, KANS., February 13, 1933.

Those signatures are all in my immediate neighborhood; only two refused to sign. I believe that if this bill was passed the Government would not have to make many loans until the loaning companies would rewrite their mortgages for the same rate, which is the object of the whole thing-a cheaper rate of interest.

We, the undersigned residents who are voters and taxpayers in the State of Kansas, hereby petition you and your honorable body to support legislation which will provide for money being loaned by the Government direct on our properties to refinance present indebtedness, thus to save our properties from foreclosure.

Such, we believe, should bear 1½ per cent interest annually, and the principal should be payable direct to the United States Government at the rate of 1½ per cent per annum.

[Signed by 104 persons.]

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, this Kansas farmer asks that the Federal Government lend money to refinance present indebtedness, "thus to save our properties from fore-

This Government, through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, is now lending moneys to banks, railroads, various industrial and commercial enterprises directly and indirectly. It is indeed difficult for farmers to see, and diffisult for me to see, why it should not also lend money to refinance farm mortgages.

Mr. President, we passed, with amendments, on Monday a distressed debtors' act which will allow farmers to take modified bankruptcy. This is largely made possible through the so-called Robinson amendment to the Sumners distressed debtors' act from the House. I voted for that meas-

But we may as well face the facts: Unless we pass also the companion measure introduced by the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. Robinson], this bankruptcy act will be of little benefit to agriculture. That proposal, as I understand it, would provide loans to farmers to allow them to make compositions with their creditors, the Government taking second mortgages on their farms up to a total indebtedness of three-fourths of their appraised value. Without some such provision, those intended to be helped by the bankruptcy amendment will not be helped to any great extent. That proposal, I understand, is being held in the Banking and Currency Committee for action by the next Congress. I can only express the hope that President-elect Roosevelt will call the special session soon, and that we may get action before it is too late.

This session of Congress has been a bitter disappointment to me, and to the people I represent in the Senate, and to the country generally. When this session met last December it had three problems on its hands. It had these three problems in addition to the plain task of balancing the Federal Budget. It had:

First, the problem of the farmer. Second, the problem of the debtor. Third, the problem of the dollar. We have not balanced the Budget.

We have not enacted any worth-while farm-relief legislation.

We have done something-not enough, so far as the farmer is concerned—to relieve the distressed debtor.

We have done nothing in the way of monetary reform. We still have the dishonest rubber dollar that requires the wheat farmer to-day to pay 4,000 bushels of wheat to discharge a debt he contracted six years ago, when he received 1,000 bushels of wheat in return for his agreement to repay what is now 4,000 bushels of wheat.

Mr. President, I hope the coming Congress will take up these problems and get action. It must balance the Budget. even if we have to give the new President broad budgetary powers to do a job we are unable or not courageous enough to do ourselves. If it is going to bring relief to the unemployed by returning them to work, it must make possible higher farm prices to give agriculture purchasing power; it must provide legal means for the relief of distressed farm debtors where that distress is due to conditions, not to the debtors' own improvidence; it must boldly use the responsibility imposed on the Congress by the Constitution, and give us an honest dollar.

Mr. President, I am aware of the fact that the World War, and the inflation which followed, were not brought about by the Congress of the United States. I am aware of the fact that Congress would not entirely have prevented a postwar inflation, nor the subsequent deflation. But I do say that it is the duty of Congress to use its power-and it has powers that it has not used-to balance the Budget, to enact legislation to relieve the farmer, to relieve the distressed farm debtor, to give us an honest dollar, and that such legislation would go a long way toward bringing about a business revival which would relieve the unemployment situation and start the return of a measurable degree of prosperity.

I hope very much to see legislation enacted along that

GUARANTY OF BANK DEPOSITS

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a number of telegrams on the subject of guaranty of bank deposits.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NASHVILLE, TENN., March 3, 1933.

Hon. John Bankhead, United States Senate:

Urge immediate passage by Government of guaranty of bank deposits.

R. W. CREIGHTON.

BIRMINGHAM, ALA., March 3, 1933.

Senator John Bankhead,

Senator John Bankhead,

United States Senate:

I heartily concur in telegram sent you by Mr. Lindley Morton in reference to Federal guaranty of bank deposits.

Hon. JOHN H. BANKHEAD,

United States Senate:
Our companies do business in 40 States, which has been enabling our coal miners and oven labor to work two and three days weekly. our coal miners and oven labor to work two and three days weekly. Recent financial developments are bringing about paralysis of commerce, resulting in materially slowing down our operations and, of course, all commerce everywhere. Aside from this economic phase we face complete demoralization among all working men everywhere. Something must be done quickly to relieve situation, and after much deliberation I have concluded only possible way is Government guarantee bank deposits. Please let me urge quick action along this line, otherwise complete paralysis and demoralization face us. lization face us.

Hon. John H. Bankhead,

United States Senate:

The banking situation has reached a deplorable and destructive point, and I believe the Federal Government can save the greatest disaster conceivable by guaranteeing bank deposits. I have never been in favor of this before, but now seems an absolutely necessity to restore confidence. It can not be pushed too rapidly.

MOBILE, ALA., March 3, 1933.

Senator BANKHEAD:

We urge you to pass bill in Senate before adjournment to-day guaranteeing safety to all depositors in national banks by the United States Government.

MOBILE DRUG CO.

BIRMINGHAM, ALA., March 2, 1933.

Hon. JOHN H. BANKHEAD,

United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

My considered judgment is that the banking situation is rapidly becoming a national catastrophe that can only be averted by a Federal guarantee of bank deposits. It is only in this manner that confidence can be restored which in turn should result in the restitution of values which will prevent the Federal Government from sustaining substantial losses by its quarantee. Failure to act will sustaining substantial losses by its guarantee. Failure to act will precipitate great destruction in all values from current levels and paralysis of commerce which will eventually cost the Federal Government far more than it would lose by a guarantee of deposits. The above deals with the economic aspect of the situation, and the humanitarian aspect is an even stronger argument in favor of such action, as it is the only way to prevent a degree of suffer-ing and misery that may be more than humans will stand.

LINDLEY C. MORTON.

BIRMINGHAM, ALA., March 3, 1933.

Hon. John H. Bankhead,

United States Senator:
The financial situation in Alabama and other States in my opinion will soon spread over the entire country, thereby producing national distress and chaos unless something is done by the National Government to guarantee bank deposits. While economic reasons for such guarantee are strong, humanitarian reasons are even stronger. I sincerely believe whatever loss might be susticed by the Country of the guarantee will be sustained by the Government in making this guarantee will be far less in the long run than it will have to take from relief now being given to various financial institutions. I sincerely trust that you will use your best efforts and influence toward quick legislation which will provide security and peace of mind for the people of our country.

CRAWFORD JOHNSON.

SEATTLE, WASH., March 3, 1933.

Senator John H. BANKHEAD:

Senator John H. Bankhead:

It is time to act while Government still can be effective, otherwise a new deal no one ever dreamed of. There is one course still open: Government guarantee of deposits in both State and national banks. You will be forced to do it to protect the Federal reserve and United States Treasury. The cost would be far less than concessions already made on war debts, possibly nothing, because only the best banks are left now. Too late now for previously suggested remedy. What good is the Glass bill if there are no banks? Surely Government can enforce honesty, safety, and protection for the public. If not, let New York have the country and run it. country and run it.

SOUND REPRODUCTION RECORDS FOR THE ADULT BLIND

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13817) to amend section 1 of the act entitled "An act to provide books for the adult blind," approved March 3, 1931.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, for reasons which I stated at the time the Senator from Utah [Mr. Smoot] moved to take up this bill, I do not think it should be considered in the closing hours of this Congress.

It is perfectly obvious that in the confusion that attends the last 12 or 14 hours of the session Senators are unable to give consideration to a matter of this kind; and, as I stated previously and desire to repeat, this measure was reported out upon very short notice, being announced only three days prior to the meeting. Citizens from my State. who are opposed to the measure and who had asked for a hearing, were unable to come on that short notice.

So far as I am concerned, I do not approve of that sort of procedure; but I have already made that explanation, and despite my plea for consideration of those personsdisinterested persons, I contend—in the field of education for the blind, the Senate overrode that request and proceeded to the consideration of this bill.

One of the principal objections raised against the bill, as I understand it, is that those who are opposing it fear that a large part of the $100,000 which is now appropriated for printing books in Braille type will be diverted for the purpose of developing this experimental mechanism for reproducing books on records, and providing machines to play those records back so that the blind may hear the books from the record.

Confronted with this situation, Mr. President, I therefore intend to offer an amendment to the bill, and I do offer the following amendment, on page 1, line 6, after the comma, to insert the words "not to exceed $10,000," so that it will

That section 1 of the act entitled "An act to provide books for the adult blind," approved March 3, 1931, is amended by adding after the word "books" the following: "published either in raised characters, and not to exceed $10,000, on sound reproduction records or in any other form."

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. WALCOTT. With reference to this amendment, I agree with everything the Senator from Wisconsin has said. The hearing was necessarily hurried, there was not very much time given for witnesses to get here, but we did the best we could. We were so much interested in this experiment, however, that we made additional checks outside of the hearing with people who knew only the Braille method, and knew nothing of this new method, and the very suggestion that this was a possibility met with the approval of every one we consulted-experts in the treatment of the blind. Yet it is experimental, and in order that there may be no danger of infringing too much on this Braille fund during the ensuing year, and yet that we may not lose this year in experimentation along this line, I personally would gladly accept the amendment, except for the fact that it is a House bill, and amending it in the Senate would force the bill into conference, and there is no time for a conference.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator from Connecticut that the House could concur in the Senate amendment and could pass the bill.

Mr. WALCOTT. I should think there would be some risk in that, and I would dislike to take any risk of losing even a month on a measure of this importance to the adult blind. I am going to make this suggestion, that if the Senator from Wisconsin will withdraw his amendment, we can declare ourselves here in favor of instructing Doctor Putnam not to exceed in his appropriation for this experiment $10,000 during the first year.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, if I can have the assurance of those who are supporting the measure that they will use their influence with Doctor Putnam to see that in no case shall the diversion of money from the printing of books in Braille exceed $10,000, and in order to accede to the request of the Senator from Connecticut and the Senator from Utah, who are interested in this measure, I will be willing, with that understanding, to withdraw my amendment, if I may have that assurance in the RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I assure the Senator that on to-morrow I shall write a letter to Doctor Putnam making that request of him.

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President, I appreciate the courtesy of the Senator from Wisconsin. I give my assurance, as the Senator from Utah gives his, and I have consulted with the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. Metcalf], and he gives his assurance.

This is an exceedingly interesting experiment. We tried it in every possible way. The records have been made, and on from 4 to 10 of these double-faced records a complete novel of three to four hundred pages can be given through this machine. The machine is an assembled machine with which they have been experimenting, to cost probably about $12 apiece, and the first 1,000 machines have already been underwritten by people who generously subscribed this $12,000 so that they will be distributed over the United States. Those interested will get the records from a circulating library in connection with the Library of Congress, and we will know a year from now whether this $10,000 expenditure has been a success. If it is a success, we can very easily increase the appropriation for these unfortunate people.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin withdraw his amendment?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I withdraw the amendment under the circumstances.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the bill be read a third time?

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BERYL M. M'HAM

Mr. REED. Mr. President, when we last had a call of the calendar, House bill 10070, for the relief of Beryl M. McHam, was objected to by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Walsh] on the ground that it gave relief to a soldier who had been dishonorably discharged. I have discussed the circumstances with that Senator and I have explained to him that the beneficiary of the measure had a most distinguished battle record throughout the World War. He was one of the first enlisted men to go to France. He served in the front-line trenches and in shell holes in front of the front-line trenches, being one of the outposts who was furnished with hand grenades. He was terribly wounded in battle, and he came up to the time of the armistice with a most distinguished record.

He went on with the army of occupation, suffering from the effects of his wounds, from the effects of gas, and was pretty generally run down. He did what a good many soldiers have done throughout the ages, drank too much at one time, and had a fist fight with a sergeant. He was brought up before a court-martial in a different outfit from the one with which he had served, the members of which did not know that this man had had any battle service. He was dishonorably discharged from the Army, and he was sentenced to 15 months' confinement in prison, as a result of that single spree and that fist fight, a perfectly preposterous sentence for any soldier. While this man was in prison serving his sentence, he received from The Adjutant General of the Army a citation for distinguished gallantry

The Committee on Military Affairs, on considering the man's record, thought that it was an outstanding case, and that for the future administration of veterans' affairs he should be considered as having been honorably discharged. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Walsh] tells me that he now desires to make no objection. I ask unanimous consent that we may take up the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws con-Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers Beryl M. McHam, who served in Company C, Twenty-sixth Regiment, and Company C, Eighth Regiment, United States Infantry, World War, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States on the 7th day of July, 1920: Provided, That no pay, compensation, benefit, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed without amendment the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 261) authorizing the Comptroller of the Currency to prescribe regulations respecting the conduct of banking business in the District of Columbia.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 5337) to amend the Federal farm loan act, as amended, to permit loans for additional purposes, to extend the powers of Federal land banks in the making of direct loans, to authorize upon certain terms the reamortization of loans by Federal and joint-stock land banks, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS SIGNED

The message further announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the following enrolled bill and joint | resolutions, and they were signed by the President pro tempore:

S. 465. An act for the relief of William H. Holmes;

S. J. Res. 261. Joint resolution authorizing the Comptroller of the Currency to prescribe regulations respecting the conduct of banking business in the District of Columbia:

S. J. Res. 262. Joint resolution to continue the joint resolution on veterans' benefits.

AMENDMENT OF IMMIGRATION LAWS

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I now renew my request for unanimous consent to proceed to the consideration of House bill 8174, to exempt from the quota fathers and mothers, over 60 years of age, of United States citizens.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Fess in the chair). Is there objection to immediate consideration?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, there has been some controversy over one or two features of the bill.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will not the Senator from Utah explain his amendment?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, there are some features of the bill, as I offered it and as the Senate committee reported it, which were objected to by the State Department. A number of conferences have been had between the State Department and the representatives of the Immigration Service, and they have agreed upon the bill if certain amendments, which

I submit an amendment which I will ask the clerk to state. The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 3, to strike out lines 20 to 25, both inclusive, and on page 4, from line 1 through line 12, as follows:

SEC. 3. Section 15 of the naturalization act of June 29, 1906 (34 Stat. 601; U. S. C., title 8, sec. 405), is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"The cancellation of a certificate of citizenship under the proceedings authorized by this section shall not terminate the citizen-ship of those who have, prior to such cancellation, derived citizen-ship through the naturalization of the individual whose certificate ship through the naturalization of the individual whose certificate of citizenship is canceled."

I shall now submit, are accepted.

Sec. 4. (a) Section 1993 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 8, sec. 6), is amended to read as follows:

"Sec. 1993. Any child hereafter born out of the limits and jurisdiction of the United States, whose father or mother is at the time of the birth of such child a citizen of the United States, is declared to be a citizen of the United States; but the rights of citizenship shall not descend to any such child unless the citizen father or citizen mother, as the case may be, has resided in the United States prior to the birth of such child."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, does the Senator intend to offer a substitute?

Mr. KING. I shall offer a substitute. Mr. REED. Mr. President, the Senator says that he is offering a substitute for the part proposed to be stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is all one amendment. Mr. REED. May we not hear the substitute read?

Mr. KING. I send to the desk the substitute, and will explain in a word what the substitute means. The amendment which I offer will clarify the text of certain provisions of existing law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. For the information of the Senate, let the amendment be reported before the Senator

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. In lieu of the matter to be stricken out, the Senator from Utah offers the following:

SEC. 3. (a) A child hereafter born out of the limits and juris-SEC. 3. (a) A child hereafter born out of the limits and jurisdiction of the United States and its outlying possessions, of parents both of whom owe allegiance to the United States, and one of whom has previously resided in the United States or its outlying possessions shall acquire at birth the nationality of its parents: Provided, That if one of the parents is a citizen of the United States and the other is a citizen or inhabitant of an outlying possession owing allegiance to the United States, such child shall acquire at birth the status of a citizen of the United States.

(b) A child hereafter born out of the limits and jurisdiction of the United States and its outlying possessions, of parents of whom one has American nationality and has previously resided in the United States, and the other is an alien, which child does not acquire at birth the nationality of an alien spouse, shall acquire the nationality status of the American parent.

(c) A child hereafter born in an outlying possession of the United States of parents one of whom owes allegiance to the United States shall acquire the nationality status of the parent who owes allegiance to the United States: Provided, That if one parent is a citizen of the United States and the other a citizen of an outlying possession owing allegiance to the United States, the child shall acquire at birth the status of a citizen of the United States.

(d) Section 1993 of the Revised Statutes is repealed.

Mr. REED. The reporting of the Senator's amendment is sufficient.

Mr. KING. On page 5, I have further amendments to suggest.

Mr. REED. Unless my copy of the bill is wrong, there is a subsection (e) and a subsection (f) which the clerk did

Mr. KING. Those were eliminated, as I was advised, in the understanding had between the State and Labor Departments.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator, who is familiar with the statute, what section is to be repealed? There is a repealing provision at the end of the amendment.

Mr. KING. It is section 1993 and section 2172.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Do I understand the text of the amendment takes the place of the two sections repealed?

Mr. KING. Yes. May I briefly state the amendment which I offered; and the Senator from Pennsylvania has one, if I understand him, to which I shall not object.

There have been some conflicting decisions, as I understand, as to one of the sections of existing law, and it has been deemed proper to clarify the matter. Accordingly one of the amendments offered will avoid conflicts that may possibly arise.

A child born abroad of American parents is recognized as an American citizen; a child born abroad of American parents, one of whom is a citizen of the United States and the other, though not a citizen, owes permanent allegiance to the United States, is declared to be an American citizen.

Under this provision a child becomes an American citizen though born abroad, if one parent only is an American citizen, and if foreign citizenship is not conferred on the child at birth.

A child born in the insular possessions of a parent owing allegiance to the United States takes the nationality of that parent. If one parent of the child is a citizen of the United States, the child becomes a citizen of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Utah.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Let the amendment be reported.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. Add at the end of the amendment of the Senator from Utah the following:

(e) The alien spouse of a citizen of the United States may obtain naturalization as a citizen of the United States upon complying with the requirements of section 4 of the act of September 22, 1922, as amended, being "An act relative to the naturalization and citizenship of married women," except that the petitioner must show that his or her spouse is residing abroad as a representative of the Government of the United States or principally as a representative of American interests, and that the petitioner intends eventually to reside permanently in the United States: Provided, That the child under 21 years of age of a person naturalized under this paragraph shall, if dwelling in the United States at the time of such naturalization, or if such child comes to the United States thereafter but prior to reaching the age of 21 years, be naturalized thereby.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania to the amendment of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, will the Senator tell us whether he has an estimate of how many immigrants will be admitted to this country by reason of the passage of this bill?

Mr. KING. I do not know. I think it will not increase the number materially. There is only one provision that might provide for an increase, and that is the one relating to fathers and mothers over 60 years of age whose children are here and are citizens of the United States.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I am told that the only country that will be affected by that provision is Turkey, and that the number of persons who would be privileged to come to this country would be less than 200. The practical effect will not be to increase immigration materially.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, we safeguarded it so as not to bring in laborers or persons who might compete with labor. Parents who may be brought in must be past 60 years of age, so they come in under conditions where the Department satisfies itself, by bond or otherwise, that they will not become dependents upon the country.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, in view of the fact that there are approximately 14,000,000 American people out of work and probably more than 8,000,000 threatened with starvation, I doubt the wisdom of increasing the immigration from any country to the United States in existing circumstances.

Mr. COPELAND. If the Senator will bear with me, it must be borne in mind that we are sending out of this country all the time, money from citizens here to take care of those persons over there. It will contribute to our welfare if that money is spent here to maintain those persons here. I am sure the unemployment situation will not be changed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania to the amendment of the Senator from Utah.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I ask that the clerks be authorized to correct the paragraph numbers and letters.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection the clerks will be so authorized.

Mr. KING. On page 5, line 4, after "repeal of," I move to strike out "section" and insert "sections 1993 and," and insert the following so that the proviso will read "repeal of sections 1993 and 2172."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection the amendment to the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator from Pennsylvania will look at section 5, I should like to ask if it is necessary to have that amendment adopted? That is to enable soldiers, when they have lost their naturalization papers, to obtain new papers for a limited fee without being required to pay the entire fee.

Mr. REED. I hope that section will remain in the bill. Mr. KING. It is a part of the bill as amended and if necessary I ask that the language on page 5 be adopted as an amendment. I am not sure whether the parliamentary status requires the adoption of that language.

Mr. REED. The amendment of the committee is still open to amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That provision is still in the bill and when the amendment is adopted it will still be there

Mr. REED. Mr. President, in section 2 of the bill, which has not been referred to, an effort is made to give relief to those aliens who have come here lawfully but without any official record of their entry. Back in the early years of this century the records of arrival, particularly at our land frontier posts, were very sparsely kept. It is impossible for many aliens who are lawfully here to prove the time and place of their arrival. This section is intended to give relief from that condition. That is the only subject to which attention is called, but inadvertently perhaps the section has another effect of giving furisdiction over registry of aliens not only to the Commissioner General of Immigration, who now has it, but also to the Commissioner of Naturalization.

It gives a divided jurisdiction and it may well be that an alien who was refused registry by the Commissioner General of Immigration would then be able to go to the Commissioner of Naturalization and get from him the registry which had been denied him by the immigration officer. I do not believe that that divided jurisdiction should be created without some investigation by the Congress. It may be it will prove to be wise, but nobody has given consideration to that phase of the matter. Therefore, for the present it seems wiser not to extend it, and accordingly I send to the desk amendments which will take care of it. I ask that the several amendments relating to that matter may be reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments to the amendment will be reported.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 3, line 1 strike out the words "Commissioner of Naturalization if the application is made and naturalization purposes or to the."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. In line 3, strike out the words "in all other cases."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. In line 4, strike out the words "Commissioner of Naturalization or the."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. In lines 5 and 6, strike out the words "as the case may be."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. In line 16, strike out "Commissioner of Naturalization or the."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the amendments be engrossed and the bill be read a third time?

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed, as follows: So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, nonquota immigration visas may be issued to otherwise admissible fathers or mothers over 60 years of age of citizens of the admissible fathers or mothers over 60 years of age of citizens of the United States who are 21 years of age or over.

SEC. 2. Subdivision (a) of section 1 of the act entitled "An act to supplement the naturalization laws, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1929, is amended to read as follows:

"That (a) the registry of aliens at ports of entry required by section 1 of the act of June 29, 1906 (34 Stat. L., Pt. I, p. 596), as amended, may be made as to any alien not ineligible to citizenship in whose case there is no record of admission for permanent residence prior to July 1, 1924 if such alien shall make a satisfactory. dence prior to July 1, 1924, if such alien shall make a satisfactory showing to the Commissioner General of Immigration, in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Commissioner General of Immigration, with the approval of the Secretary of Labor, that

(h) The amendments made by this section to section 1993 of the Revised Statutes and section 5 of the act of March 2, 1907, and the repeal of sections 1993 and 2172 of the Revised Statutes, shall not terminate citizenship acquired under such sections before such amendments or repeal.

SEC. 4. Section 32 (a) of such act of June 29, 1906, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following: "An alien veteran as defined in section 1 of the act of May 26, 1926 (ch. 398, 44 Stat. 654; U. S. C., Supp. I, title 8, sec. 241), shall not be required to pay the fee required by this subdivision."

The title was amended so as to read: "An act to amend the immigration and naturalization laws."

INLAND WATERWAY, VIRGINIA-NORTH CAROLINA

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of Calendar 1209, the bill (H. R. 6184) for the improvement of the inland waterway from Norfolk, Va., to Beaufort Inlet, N. C.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I think I should call attention to the fact that there is a minority report upon the bill, and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM], in fairness, should be notified if the bill is to be taken up.

Mr. BAILEY. I am glad the Senator from Michigan mentioned that. I was going to refer to it when the bill came up, but the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM] and also the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. Moses] have assured me that they will have no further objection to the consideration and passage of the bill.

Mr. MOSES. The Senator from New Hampshire is present and confirms the statement of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. VANDENBERG. In that event I withdraw any objection.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, on page 2, line 2, after the word "conditions," to insert the words "and limitations," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following works of improvement are hereby adopted and authorized to be prosecuted under the direc-tion of the Secretary of War and supervision of Chief of Engineers, in accordance with the plans recommended in the report herein-after designated: Inland waterway from Norfolk, Va., to Beaufort Inlet, N. C., in accordance with the report submitted in Rivers and Harbors Committee Document No. 5, Seventy-second Congress, first session, and subject to the conditions and limitations set forth in said document.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

J. R. REIMER

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I invite attention to Calendar No. 1440, the bill (H. R. 2935) for the relief of J. R. Reimer. I objected to that this afternoon, but upon further examination I think perhaps the bill should pass. I ask for its consideration.

There being no objection, the bill was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to allow credit in the accounts of J. R. Reimer, postmaster at Clinton, Okla., for $459.90 unlawfully paid to a substitute clerk, C. H. Markum, for vehicle hire.

DELLA O'BRIEN

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of Order of Business 1459, being House bill 7128. This is a bill to compensate the mother of a young woman who was killed as the result of injuries received when a United States mail truck struck her. I think the Senator from Utah objected to it, but I understand he is willing to withdraw his objection.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I have no objection to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. 7128) for the relief of Della O'Brien was read, considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Della O'Brien, of Cleveland, Ohio, the sum of $5,000, in full settlement of all claims against the Government of the United States on account of the death of Nora O'Brien, daughter of the said Della O'Brien, resulting from injuries received February 9, 1931, when a United States mail truck struck her: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 per cent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 per cent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

BILLS INDEFINITELY POSTPONED

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, three bills appear upon the calendar as if awaiting action by the Senate. As a matter of fact, the Senate has acted upon them, and I should like to have the record so show. The first is Order of Business No. 366, being the bill (S. 3696) to provide for cooperation by the Federal Government with the several States in relieving the hardship and suffering caused by unemployment, and for other purposes; the second is Order of Business 851, being the bill (S. 4755) to provide for grants and loans to the several States to aid in relieving unemployment, to facilitate the construction of self-liquidating projects, to provide for the construction of certain authorized Federal public-works projects, and for other purposes; and the third is Order of Business No. 1322, being the bill (S. 5609) to amend the emergency relief and construction

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What is the Senator's request?

Mr. WAGNER. I want, in some way, to have the calendar indicate that the bills referred to have been passed or acted upon by the Senate. They appear upon the calendar as if they had not been acted upon.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator will have to run his pencil through them.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I think we can have the permanent records of the Senate show that action has been taken. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. Is it not possible to have the permanent records of the Senate show that these bills have been acted upon?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. REED. Could not that end be obtained if the Senator from New York should ask unanimous consent that the bills referred to by him be dropped from the calendar?

Mr. WAGNER. They either should be dropped from the calendar or indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the bills referred to by the Senator from New York will be indefinitely

P. F. GORMLEY & CO.

Mr. STEIWER. I present a conference report and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read. The Chief Clerk read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 197) conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to render findings of fact in the claim of P. F. Gormley Co., having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House numbered 1, 3, and 4, and the amendment to the title, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 2: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 2, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted in said amendment insert the following: "and also claims for damages for extra costs occasioned by orders of the Navy Department requiring the contractor to pay wages at rates fixed by war-time wage boards: by the commandeering of contractor's labor for use on war-time work considered more urgent; for increased costs due to extended period of performance necessitated by war-time conditions and war orders, with the right on the part of the Government to present any legal and equitable set-offs and defenses"; and the House agree to the

> FREDERICK STEIWER, WALLACE H. WHITE, Jr., Managers on the part of the Senate. MILES C. ALLGOOD, CHARLES H. MARTIN, J. H. SINCLAIR, Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator explain what the amendments were?

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, this measure is in the form of a joint resolution. It was introduced by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Walsh]. It confers jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear a certain cause and provides among the items that may be embraced within the hearing or considered two sets of prospective rights. The House in its consideration of the joint resolution struck out those two particular items, but in conference the House receded from its disagreement to the insertion of one item and that was restored, while the other item remained out of the measure. I am sure there can be no objection to the conference report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

RELIEF OF UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter from the Ohio Unemployed League, of Columbus, Ohio, and an accompanying memorandum of their demands.

There being no objection, the letter and memorandum were ordered to be printed in the Recorp, as follows:

> OHIO UNEMPLOYED LEAGUE, Columbus, Ohio, March 3, 1933.

Hon. Robert Bulkley,

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

Dear Sir: The State convention of the Ohio Unemployed League,

Dear Sir: The State convention of the Ohio Unemployed League, held in Columbus on February 27-28, has instructed us to present the demands of the organized unemployed to you, with a view that vigorous and coordinated Federal and State action may be taken immediately to relieve the situation.

Reports made by delegates from all sections of Ohio revealed increasing misery, with the picture ever growing darker, in this fourth year of the depression.

In some places, to cite challenging examples, men are working for 30 cents a day for a 9-hour day. Relief abuses, both as to inadequacy of amount to maintain any decent living conditions and as to defects in administration, are almost universal.

The unemployed want work. They want the factories, mines, and mills reopened. We submit that the State and Nation must reopening of industrial establishments.

The organized unemployed of Ohio have worked out demands which we submit herewith. They call for State action, but also for national encouragement of such State action. We call your particular attention to the "lowest-level-of-existence budget," worked out as a necessity for American workers merely to exist upon. The figures are above challenge, and show that $18.35 should be assured each week to a family of five—man, wife, and three children. The Federal Government, through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and other agencies, should urge upon the States recognition of this budget in relief administration. Sufficient funds should be available to make the budget a cer-upon the States recognition of this budget in relief administration. Sufficient funds should be available to make the budget a certainty for the American family.

If that can not be done, then surely the time has come to conscript factories and mills and run them in this great emergency, putting the workers to work at decent wages.

Our action in coming to Washington is a last stand of the unemployed, representative workers in their communities, for narricalization in a drastically needed near deal. participation in a drastically needed new deal. Yours very truly, WM. R. TRUAX, President. ARNOLD JOHNSON, Director Organization Department.

MEMORANDUM OF DEMANDS FROM OHIO UNEMPLOYED LEAGUE Our demands, formulated and adopted at the Niles convention of November 6, after careful study, and reaffirmed by the present Columbus convention, are:

L ON RELIEF STANDARDS

The following figures were arrived at on the basis of the lowest possible level of existence. This under no condition is to be used as a base for wage rates.

1. Demands for a family of 5 for a week:
Food	$6.25
Clothing	2.75
Coal (for six months)
Light	. 57
Cooking fuel	. 57
Shelter	3.46
Medical and dental care	1.50
Household necessities
Personal necessities
Household replacements
Total	18. 35
 These demands were worked out from the following allow (a) Clothing—for a man per year—
One suit	$15.00
Shoes	5.00
Shirts	1.50
Socks (7 pair)	1.00

One suit	$15.00
Shoes	5.00
Shirts	1.50
Socks (7 pair)
Underwear	3.00
Overcoat	5.00
Hat	1.00
Total	29. 50
(b) For a woman, per year—
Dresses (1 at $5 and 4 at 50 cents)	$7.00

2.	These	demands	were	worked	out	from	the	following	allow-

(b) F	or a woman, per year—Continued. Coat————————————————————————————————————	3.00 1.50
(c) F	Total or a child, per year (based on a girl of 12 years)— Dresses (1 at $4 and 4 at 50 cents) Shoes Hoslery Underwear Coat Hat Sweater	6, 00 6. 00 4. 00 1. 50 6. 00 1. 00
	Total	25. 50

Total for man, wife, and 3 children, for a year__.

By dividing this total by 52 weeks we arrive at the figure of $2.56 per week for clothing for a family of five. By making other small allowances the figure of $2.75 a week was arrived at.

Other items arrived at by the same process:

Food, per person per week Coal, per family for week (figured for 6 months) _____ 1.15

All other items as indicated in the budget: The item of household necessities includes: Soap, broom, tollet paper, etc. Household replacements include: Sheets, towels, curtains, etc. Personal necessities include: Shaving soap, razor blades, talcum powder, tooth paste, etc.

II. ON ADDITIONAL NECESSARY MEASURES OF RELIEF

- 1. No water to be shut off under any circumstances, because water is a necessity and because of the health laws of the State.

 2. No gas or electricity to be shut off, as these are utilities considered necessary to the housewife of to-day.

 3. Reduction of all utility rates, which includes the abolition of service charges where they are in force.

4. All relief must be paid in cash.

- 5. Unemployed organizations must have majority representation on all relief administrative and dispensing bodies. Such representatives to be appointed on recommendation of the unemployed organizations themselves.
- 6. All relief work must be done at the prevailing rate of wages in the particular locality where the work is being done, with the minimum of 40 cents per hour as provided by State law.

 7. Relief for single men and women should be prorated.
- Unemployment insurance to be paid by Federal, State, and

- industry.

 9. Free textbooks for public schools.

 10. Recognition by public officials of their responsibility to the
- 11. To gain the above demands the organizations shall use any means necessary under the circumstances obtaining at that time. We take this occasion also to remind you of the discriminatory and illegal practice in our State relief organizations by which auto licenses are taken from unemployed men who are on relief.

III. ON TAXATION

The burden of taxation to be borne by those best able to pay, through inheritance and income taxes in the higher brackets; taxation of utility and corporation profits; and the removal of exemption from tax-exempt securities, through which at the present time the rich evade their just contribution to the common realform. welfare.

A moratorium on taxes on consumption and on taxes bearing on the small farmer and the worker.

Mr. McNARY. I move that the Senate take a recess until 10.30 a. m. to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Saturday, March 4, 1933, at 10.30 a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, MARCH 3, 1933

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we thank Thee that Thou art always nigh and the gate of prayer is never closed. O Thou who didst breathe hope into cheerless lives and stretched forth Thy hand to falling patriots and martyrs, glory be unto Thy holy name forever. By the prayers and hardships of our heroic sires and their valorous sons and daughters Thou hast raised up a nation of power and wealth to be an inspiration for good government throughout the world. They toiled, they bled, they taught, and they achieved. Blessed be their memory forever. Grant, O Lord, unto the East, the West, the North, the South all the blessedness of a united and a regenerated country. As long as there is human weakness to be strengthened, as long as there is aspiration to be developed, as long as there is character to be unfolded, may we never undervalue the inheritance which has been committed unto us. O God of love, we bear upon our praying lips a petition for our President elect and our Vice President elect and their hearthstones; may no peril befall them. The Lord God be with them through the years, and establish Thou the work of their hands. O may the ship of state sail on and on, always casting a jubilant anchor of honor and good will in the harbors of the world. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE OF THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a joint resolution of the House of the following title:

H. J. Res. 572. Joint resolution to provide for further investigation of certain public-utility corporations engaged in interstate commerce.

The message also announced that the Senate had ordered that the bill (H. R. 11035) for the relief of Price Huff be returned to the House pursuant to its request.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed joint resolutions of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. J. Res. 261. Joint resolution authorizing the comptroller of the Currency to prescribe regulations respecting the conduct of banking business in the District of Columbia; and

S. J. Res. 262. Joint resolution to continue the joint resolution on veterans' benefits.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House is requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

H. R. 14643. An act making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate disagrees to the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 465) entitled "An act for the relief of William H. Holmes," requests a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. Capper, Mr. Steiwer, and Mr. Trammell to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate No. 8 to the bill (H. R. 6684) entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to modify the terms of existing contracts for the sale of timber on Indian land when it is in the interest of the Indians so to do."

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13520) entitled "An act making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, and for other purposes."

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House to bills of the Senate of the following titles:

S. 660. An act for the relief of Hamilton Grounds;

S. 1067. An act for the relief of Agnes M. Angle;

S. 1978. An act for the relief of Daisy Anderson;

S. 2862. An act for the relief of W. H. Hendrickson;

S. 2941. An act for the relief of the Holy Family Hospital, St. Ignatius. Mont.:

S. 3443. An act to authorize the Secretary of War to grant a right of way to the Alameda Belt Line across the Benton Field Military Reservation. Alameda, Calif.:

S. 3592. An act confirming the claim of Francis R. Sanchez, and for other purposes;

S. 4909. An act for the relief of A. Y. Martin;

S. 5382. An act providing for an exchange of lands between the Colonial Realty Co. and the United States, and for other purposes;

S. 5537. An act to convey certain land in the county of Los Angeles, State of California; and

S. 5612. An act to provide for the selection of certain lands in the State of California for the use of the California State park system.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL, 1934

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 14643) making appropriation for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable, in whole or in part, against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments, disagree to the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 14643, the District of Columbia appropriation bill, disagree to the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference. The Chair may state to the gentleman from Missouri that the Senate has not asked for a conference.

Mr. CANNON. I understood they had. If not, then we ask for a conference.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the Senate has added 174 amendments to this bill. They have cut the bill all to pieces. One of these 174 amendments alone will take $3,500,000 out of the Treasury. It means much to the taxpayers in all the States.

Mr. Speaker, with the understanding that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Cannon] will assure us that before the conferees on this bill meet we will be given ample opportunity to digest all these amendments and know exactly what they contain, I shall not object. Otherwise I shall.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. What item is represented by the $3,500,000 added by the Senate?

Mr. BLANTON. That is the additional gift the Senate annually gives the people here in the District of Columbia out of the people's Treasury in addition to the $6,500,000 gift already in the bill which the gentleman from Michigan said was the limit that ought to be given.

Mr. SNELL. I concede that the allowance of $6,500,000 to the District is ample under present conditions.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentlemen, then, agrees with me that we ought to have ample time to study these 174 amendments?

Mr. SNELL. I do not know that I can agree about the time, because time is very important now, but I am very decided in my views as to that one item.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, with the understanding that the gentleman from Missouri, chairman of the committee, will give us ample time to consider these amendments before we go into conference, I shall not object. This bill was passed in the Senate to-day, has 174 amendments in it, and we must have time to study them.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, we shall be glad to give all the time possible, but this bill must be enacted by to-morrow, and, necessarily, we will have to go to conference this afternoon.

Mr. BLANTON. I do not object to holding the conference this afternoon and let it continue all night if necessary, for that matter, but we want until this afternoon to carefully check up these 174 amendments.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and appoints the following conferees: Messrs. Cannon, Granfield, Blanton, Holaday, and Simmons.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a further unanimous-consent request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CANNON. We must call the conference this afternoon by 5 o'clock, and as the bill must be passed to-morrow it will be practically impossible for us to come back to the House for a vote on any Senate amendment subject to a point of order under section 2, Rule XX.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that section 2 of Rule XX be waived in the consideration of the conference report on the District appropriation bill.

Mr. BLANTON. That is too important a provision to waive. I shall be forced to object, for that would leave the House absolutely without proper protection.

Mr. Speaker, I object.

WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL, FISCAL YEAR 1934

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report on the bill (H. R. 14199) making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill. The conference report is as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 14199) making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 36 and 37.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 7, 8, and 22, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 12: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 12, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$2,796,465"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 23: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 23, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed in the last line of said amendment insert "$168.827"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 27: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 27, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$1,183,723"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 41: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 41, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$837,219"; and the Senate agree to the same.

The committee of conference report in disagreement amendments numbered 6, 29, 30, and 31.

Ross A. Collins,
William C. Wright,
Tillman B. Parks,
Henry E. Barbour,
Frank Clague,
Managers on the part of the House.
David A. Reed,
Hiram Bingham,
Kenneth McKellar,
Duncan U. Fletcher,
John B. Kendrick,
Frederick Steiwer,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, as agreed to by the conferees, including the agreements encompassed by the pending conference report and the amendments I shall propose, instead of an increase of $24,146,630, proposed by the Senate, the bill will carry $985,028 more than when it passed the House, of which $938,604 is on account of military activities and $46,424 on account of nonmilitary items.

This means that the total amount carried by the bill for military and nonmilitary items will aggregate $349,840,749, or $2,689,396 under the Budget estimate.

There are four amendments in disagreement, but these are all technical disagreements. The conferees on the part of the House and the Senate are in full agreement as to these four amendments.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman vield?

Mr. COLLINS. I yield.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Do I understand that the Taber amendment, the Connery amendment, and the Couzens amendment are now all killed?

Mr. COLLINS. They are eliminated.

Mr. SNELL. Is the citizens' military training camp item now in the bill the same as it was when it left the House?

Mr. COLLINS. The amount for citizens' military training camp work is $2,500,000, the amount carried as the bill passed the House.

Mr. SNELL. I could not understand just what the gentleman from Alabama said, but as I understand, the Couzens amendment is entirely out.

Mr. COLLINS. The Couzens amendment is entirely out.

Mr. THOMASON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLINS. I yield.

Mr. THOMASON. What about the purchase of more horses?

Mr. COLLINS. The amount of $50,000 is carried in the bill for the purchase of horses, as against approximately $83,500 as carried in the Senate bill.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. And considerably less than what the Budget recommended for horses.

Mr. COLLINS. Considerably less; yes.

Mr. SNELL. And as I understand, the bill is now only a little less than $1,000,000 more than when it left the House?

Mr. COLLINS. A little less than $1,000,000; yes. Mr. SNELL. You did pretty well.

Mr. COLLINS. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. The gentleman always does well. Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Parker].

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I am going to resist the adoption of this conference report. I feel justified in resisting the adoption of the report for the reason that the House and Senate were in disagreement on one amendment, and the House has twice voted in a particular way, but the conferees have set aside the wishes of the House. I want a roll call on this proposition before I am willing to yield.

The amendment I have reference to is a provision that was placed in the War Department appropriation bill by the House to the effect that no part of the appropriation for transportation will be used by the Army in operating a railroad in my State.

The Democratic Party, as a matter of policy and as a matter of principle, is not in favor of the Government being in business in competition with private industry, and especially are we Democrats opposed to the Government operating the railroads of the country at this time, when the little revenue that is derived from them is so sorely needed by the railroads themselves.

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. RICH. The gentleman says the Democratic Party is not in favor of being in business in competition with private industry. Does the gentleman think the Democratic Party will want the Government to operate Muscle Shoals?

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. I do not, sir. Mr. RICH. I am very glad to know that.

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. And the gentleman will recall that I stood on the floor of this House and almost single handed, so far as my side of the House was concerned, voted against that proposition at the last session of the Congress.

So far as the Republican membership of the House is concerned, I understand that you feel about the situation the same as we do on our side of the aisle, and I had hoped to have the support of the Republican Members of the House in this matter. When the matter was voted on by the House the first time, the vote was nearly 5 to 1 against the Government operating this railroad; and when the matter came back to the House on the conference report, when the two Houses were in disagreement, the House again voted unanimously for this provision to stay in the bill.

The conferees now come back to the House, and because one of them, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Wright], is personally willing for the Government to operate this road, he has controlled the conference report, and the conferees now submit a report that is not in accordance with the vote of the House on two occasions, and I am going to ask the Membership of the House to give me a vote on this proposition and let us see whether or not we want the War Department to go into Georgia and operate this railroad.

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. I will.

Mr. RICH. Does not the gentleman believe that when one of the departments of the Government, such as the War Department, gets one of these railroads it wants to keep it, because they can increase their personnel, and if we take the railroad away from the War Department, then the department will attend to its proper duties?

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. Absolutely. They ought not to operate these railroads, especially at this time when all the railroads of the country are flat on their backs and not able to sustain themselves.

The Central of Georgia Railroad in my State has operated this little Fort Benning Railroad for 13 years. At no time has the Congress ever been asked to make an appropriation for the operation of the property, but the conferees come here to-day and in this bill ask the Congress to appropriate money to the Army to operate the railroad when Congress has never before been asked for such an appropriation. The language the House inserted in the bill placed a limitation on the appropriation and restrained the War Department from using any of the appropriations for this purpose.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman from Georgia two additional minutes.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. Yes. Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Will the gentleman inform the House how much additional cost will be entailed by adopting the conference report on this particular item?

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. I understand the appropriation carried for the operation of this railroad is $12,000, or $1,000 a month; and, as I said before, no appropriation has ever been made before and none has ever been asked for.

When the War Department took this railroad away from the Central of Georgia they gave as their excuse the reason that the service was unsatisfactory. When we went to the mat with them and fought out that proposition, they then came here to the House, and they now say it is a question of economy. They now say it will mean a saving to the Government if we make this appropriation which we have never made before. There can be no saving to the Government unless the Interstate Commerce Commission should declare this little sidetrack, or this plant facility, to be a common carrier and permit this railroad company as such to divide the freight rates with the railroads of the country after they have pulled the Army's freight all over the United States.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Will the gentleman again yield? Mr. PARKER of Georgia. I will.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. If this conference report is now rejected, it is shown on its face that there will be a saving of $12,000.

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. Yes.

Another point I wish to refer to is that the gentlemen who are incorporating themselves as the Fort Benning Railroad are all from North Carolina. They do not own any railroad equipment, they do not pay any taxes in Georgia, and they should not be placed in the category of a common carrier when they are being used as a cat's-paw for the Army to operate this railroad.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. Parker of Georgia) there were 121 ayes and 11 noes.

So the conference report was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 6: Page 9, line 22, strike out "$2,143" and insert in lieu thereof "$3,810," and the appropriation for pay of the Army, fiscal year 1933, shall be available for the increased pay and allowances of one retired officer on active duty in addition to the two retired officers specified in the War Department act for that fiscal year.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 29: Page 40, line 25, strike out "expenses not to exceed $26,981" and insert in lieu thereof the word "expenses."

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, I move to recede and concur with the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Restore the matter stricken out by said amendment and amend by inserting in lieu of the amount named therein $44,315.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 30: Page 45, line 4, after the words "in all," rike out "including not to exceed $3,320 in the aggregate for strike out traveling expenses."

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, I move to concur with the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Restore the matter stricken out by said amendment, amend it by inserting in lieu thereof the amount named therein, "$17,265."

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 31: Page 45, line 12, after the word "Academy," insert a colon, and the following: "Provided, That the duties of the librarian of the United States Military Academy may be performed by an officer of the Regular Army retired from active service under the provisions of section 1251 of the Revised Statutes, and detailed on active duty for that purpose.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider the several votes was laid on the table

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Keller] such time as he may desire.

EVOLUTION OR REVOLUTION-A CHOICE

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, as soon as men began to understand that they really possessed rights, the first one they recognized and announced to the world was the right to live by their labor. Following this the right to labor was accepted as the universal capital of mankind. It was then, is now, and always will be the primary—the basic capital upon which all other forms of capital must rest. Its primary rights over all other capital, where they at all conflict. can not be questioned. Our own great Declaration of Independence makes the right to life the first God-given right. And the right to life depends on the opportunity to It, therefore, is the first duty of government to provide the opportunity for all men to live by their labor. We have been so intensely interested in the doing of things, the making of profits, in the piling up of dollars that we have completely overlooked the very first human right and failed to understand that this very first right of humanity is the vital foundation of all economics. Notwithstanding this great truth the laws of all countries have gone far afield to protect, guarantee, and assure the security of all that capital which labor has produced. But not a single government has greatly concerned itself in protecting, guaranteeing, or assuring the security of this right to labor. This right to labor, this universal human capital, is the only capital unsecured by law. It transcends all other economic rights. Yet a man can come into court and secure protection of his right to a hog, but he can not come into any court anywhere and secure protection of his own right to labor and to live. This failure to recognize this right to labor and to live is the basis and foundation of all the difficulties from which we are so grievously suffering to-day.

LAW OFFERS NO PROTECTION

The law has proceeded to protect and assure possession of the things men made, no matter who possesses the things, and overlooked the men themselves who made those things. We must awaken to the fact that the maker is vastly more important than the thing he makes. We have been making the mistake of trying to lead from things back to men. instead of leading from men back to things.

When the failure is not his fault, the farmer has a right to protect his home, and keep his family in it; and that right is superior to the right of contract under which he was being evicted.

HUMAN RIGHTS PARAMOUNT

Validity of all contracts are subsidiary to the human rights involved and always have been. I do not advocate the breaking of the law. I advocate the modification of any law, however, which transgresses the right of a man to live by his labor. And it is a recognition of the actual paramountcy of these human rights over all others to which this present disaster is bound to lead us. In the presence of 12,000,000 men who are being denied this first rightthis right to labor and to live-in the presence of the 40,-000,000 American women and children who are compelled for the first time to accept what men call charity-we are going to do many new things. We are going to set new precedents-make new laws-put human rights ahead of property rights. Oh, no; it will not bring chaos. It will not destroy society. It will bring laws and customs into harmony with human rights and result in peace and plenty, in growth, and in progress. It will bring order and permanency to government and security to men and mothers and children.

MUST RECOGNIZE RIGHTS OF FARMER

We need not fear our farmers. They are the salt of the earth. They have for the first time gone on strike-a peaceful strike which this Congress should interpret, not in fear, but as an assurance of their necessities and their rights in the case. We must recognize those rights. Already this farm strike is bearing fruit. Already the lifeinsurance companies have declared a moratorium on foreclosure of mortgages in Iowa. They will follow suit in all the other States. Will these companies lose by this? Certainly not. They will save much—they will save themselves. A way out will be found for the whole condition, much better for all than it would have been to throw out into the highways the men and women who have struggled a lifetime to build homes. We must provide for moratoriums against the sale of homes under present conditions. Then see to it that we shall not again be called on to use them.

LABOR ALONE CREATES WEALTH

The right to labor and to live transcends all other rights. All the wealth of our land is the direct result of that universal right. The men who created the wealth of the land had a right to the possession and enjoyment of a great part of it.

WEALTH IS CONCENTRATED

But in fact and in truth what do we find? An investigation made by order of the United States Senate during the years 1923-24, and printed in 1925, showed at that time that 1 per cent of the people, counting men, women, and children, owned 60 per cent of all the wealth of the country; that 22 per cent of the people owned 35 per cent of the remaining 40 per cent of the wealth; and the remaining 77 per cent of the people owned the remaining 5 per cent of the wealth of the whole country. That is to say—with a population of 120,000,000—with a total national wealth of $400,000,000,000,000 we had the following condition:

One million two hundred thousand people owned $240,-000,000,000, or $200,000 apiece on the average, counting men, women, and children; 26,400,000 people owned $120,-000,000,000, or $5,303 apiece on the average; the remaining 92,400,000 people combined owned $20,000,000,000, or $216.45 a piece on the average.

PANICS ARE PRODUCED BY THE FEW

Anyone who has studied panics and at all understands how the forces that originate, direct, and control panics and depressions for their own profit, must know that this worst of all panics and depressions has resulted in the concentration of a much larger percentage than 60 per cent in the hands of the 1 per cent of the people. Without having the opportunity to give the study which it would require to estimate the matter with certainty, I can not help reckoning that at the present time 1 per cent of the people own no less than 75 per cent of the wealth; that the next 22 per cent of the people own 22 per cent of the wealth; and the remaining 77 per cent of the people own the remaining 3 per cent of the wealth of the country. I do not stand alone in this belief. A former United States ambassador, himself a very wealthy man with most intimate knowledge of financial affairs, said to me in New York recently:

Before the panic we had as good distribution of wealth as any other nation. But the concentration of wealth which has resulted from the panic and the ensuing depression is beyond belief.

The great majority of those who produce wealth by their toil have almost no wealth, and those who produce no wealth at all have nearly all the wealth. The strike of the farmers has, I hope, compelled us to see this as a no-longer endurable wrong. We must, we can, and we will remedy that stupid abuse. But not by sitting here idle all the day long; not by holding blindly to old and outworn customs and ideas.

STAND-PAT MINDS MUST GIVE WAY TO PROGRESSIVE MINDS

It matters not that the stand-pat mind shall object and invent bugaboos to frighten financial children. For be it remembered, these so-called conservatives—these actual reactionaries—who have so long controlled government in their own interests, have not had a single new thought, not a single constructive idea since the system, through which their big ones made their money, collapsed in 1929.

THREE AND ONE-HALF YEARS WITHOUT AN IDEA

These objectors seek only one thing-to somehow keep control by preventing change. They have no idea what to do for the country, because in these three and a half years, out of their whole group, not a single constructive suggestion has found the light. They are simply insisting on the people of the country starving through, as always heretofore. Any other way out they call radical; and any man who dares think along any line except the outworn course which we have heretofore followed under their guidance they call dangerous. They refuse to awaken into a world with new ideas, even though we perish without them. They can not possibly understand that the old conditions have passed. That what they see as radical—as dangerous—is to become constantly more radical and more dangerous the longer they themselves resist the necessary change. To them change is so painful that they prefer to compel revolution rather than tolerate evolution. We must now from dire necessity pass them by and disregard their fatuous cries and warnings. Only the doing of new things can restore us and the following of new ideas maintain us in a state of growth. Without that constant development we perish. Already too long have we sat here and talked of old ways out of this difficulty.

ECONOMY DEGENERATED INTO DESTRUCTIVE PARSIMONY

Since I came to this body a year ago last December we have filled 21,000 pages of the Congressional Record with talks mostly about economy and about—yes—E-E-E-conomy, and more economy, and from bad economy to worse and worse economy, until we have turned what might have been some justifiable saving into destructive parsimony. We have shouted out from day to day the great misfortunes of the country until we have hypnotized ourselves and many of our people into believing that we can scrimp and pinch and starve and brutalize ourselves out of this catastrophe—and through that process alone.

BALANCE THE BUDGET-WITH WHAT AND WHY?

We are told constantly that we must balance the Budget. Yet what we call a budget is no budget at all but only a conglomeration of estimates for appropriations. It makes no distinction between regular running expenses, permanent governmental improvements, revolving funds, and government advances. The result is that there is not a man in Congress who really knows where we are at with any financial certainty. That is why there are constant disputes between the administration and Congress about a budget which is no budget at all. But whatever it is, we are told we must balance it; that it will ruin our credit if we do not. Now, let us inquire into this matter: When we fail to collect as much money in a given year as we spend in that year, that is called a deficit, and the Budget or expenditures account lacks that much of being met, or being balanced.

FEDERAL BUDGET OUT OF BALANCE ONE-THIRD OF OUR TIME

Have we always balanced our Budget each year in times gone by? Or have we had annual deficits before this? If we have had deficits, have these deficits ruined our credit or not? Let me see. Our Treasury report shows that in the 144 years of our constitutional Government from 1789 to 1933, both inclusive, there have been 49 annual deficits-a little more than one-third of the years of our national existence have been years of unbalanced budgets. Thirteen of those years at most were war years. Thirty-six years were peace-time years. All the war years were years of deficits, with unbalanced Budgets. Of the 131 years of peace, 1 year out of each 3 years and 8 months showed a deficit. The whole 144-year period taken together shows, that on the average 1 year out of every 2 years and 11 months has been a deficit year with its unbalanced Budget.

OUR CREDIT NEVER IN JEOPARDY

Did all these annual deficits ruin our credit? Certainly not. Is it ruined now? Oh, nonsense! The issues of shorttime Government notes during the entire period of this terrible panic and depression have always been many times oversubscribed in a few days.

ONLY OWE 5 PER CENT OF OUR WEALTH

Let us note further that at the end of the Civil War our national wealth was $20,000,000,000 and our bonded indebtedness was two and three quarters billion dollars. That is, we owed 1334 per cent of our total national wealth. Under normal conditions our present national wealth certainly exceeds $400,000,000,000. Counting out the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, the revolving funds, and governmental advances that will certainly be returned to the Government, we owe at the present approximately twenty billions-or bare 5 per cent of our national wealth-as against 13% per cent at the end of the Civil War. Besides that, we are now producing, when at work, five times as much wealth man for man as we were at the end of the Civil War. That is, we could or can in case of necessity pay five times as much debt as we were able to do at that time. The bugaboo of national insolvency is childish.

WHAT CAUSED OUR PRESENT DEFICIT?

But let us make another inquiry, disregarding entirely the general causes which led to this financial chaos. Let us ask, What are the direct causes of the present extraordinary deficits? Here are the facts: First, the income taxes actually collected for 1918 were $4,385,000,000. Then what happened? Instead of leaving the war-time taxes on till the war debts were paid by the men who made the war billions, as ought to have been done, the Congress, following the advice of the rich man's rich Secretary of the Treasury, reduced income taxes five times in eight years, with a return of only $1.056,-000,000 for 1932. Each time the tax ratio was reduced for the ensuing year the Congress also remitted-gave backan equal amount of taxes already due.

STUPIDITY AT ITS HEIGHT

And then in the December session of Congress of 1929, after the awful panic on the New York Stock Exchange, when any student of economics should have known what an awful national panic and terrible depression would certainly follow that stock crash, this House and the Senate, contrary to every rule of economics, against all common sense, again reduced the income taxes and again remitted-this time only a paltry hundred sixty million dollars-and made certain a deficit for the following year. It is but fair, however, to call attention to the fact that there was during that entire period a number of men in this body who saw clearly the mistake being made, and who always opposed these incometax reductions. Our Democratic leader, HENRY T. RAINEY. and the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. RAMSEYER, in December, 1929, pointed out the certainty of a deficit for the ensuing year if the reduction and remission were made. Yet against such an evident folly there were only 17 votes in this House.

CHEATING RICH GET IN THEIR HANDS

Second. But worse by far than the reductions of income taxes by Congress was the fact that a very large proportion the reduced income taxes which Congress levied, but used every means to cheat, swindle, and defraud the Government. not out of millions but out of billions of dollars actually due the people under the law. This cheating, defrauding, and swindling was well known to the Treasury Department. And that department took no action to prevent that shameless thievery. It continued year after year with the knowledge, if not with the actual connivance, of the Treasury Department. The very first attempt to prevent this thievery on a grand scale was made by the last session of Congress when we largely restored the income-tax rates. I am informed that even that attempt has not prevented the continued stealing of a quarter of a billion a year. Yet we wonder why the Budget is not balanced.

NEW METHODS TO RAID THE TREASURY ADOPTED

What is the third immediate cause of our deficits of the past three years? It is this: There had been paid into the Treasury income taxes by the rich men and corporations wast sums of money. Up to 1924 the law did not even permit an application for a refund, unless at the time the tax was paid a protest was made against the injustice of the payment. But in that year the law was so changed as to permit the Treasury Department to open any case the officials desired, clear back to the beginning of the income-tax period, and make whatever refunds the men in charge saw fit to make. Against this ruling there was no appeal; there was no remedy except through Congress, which failed to act. When it was all fixed there ensued such a raid on the Treasury as it is really difficult to believe. Through this system refunds amounting to nearly four billions of the people's money have been paid out in cold cash, including 6 per cent interest after the awards have been made. These are the three direct and immediate causes of our present deficits; these show why the Budget is not balanced. These refunds alone would pay all the deficits of the past three years.

NATIONAL INCOME BALANCED THE BUDGET, 1919-1929

Now, what about balancing this supposed Budget? The expenditures for all appropriations were met out of the annual Government income from 1919 up to and including 1929, because the national income increased each year during that entire period. But what of the time since 1929? For that year the national income was $85,000,000,000; for 1930 it was $71,000,000,000; for 1931 it was $54,000,000,000; for 1932 it was thirty-seven and a half billion dollars. Let us note that the decrease for 1930 was 16 per cent under that of 1929; for 1931 it was 24 per cent under that of 1930; and for 1932 it was 31 per cent below the previous year.

NATIONAL INCOME FOR 1933 ESTIMATED BELOW TWENTY-FOUR BILLIONS

At the same rate of decrease the national income for 1933 will fall below $24,000,000,000. That approaches catastrophe. If it were possible to save, scrimp, and penny-pinch our way out of this depression, it would be necessary to save more than we lose each year.

As has been previously pointed out, our annual income was eighty-five billions during 1928 and 1929.

In 1930 we lost in national income below that figure $14,000,000,000.

In 1931 we lost $31,000,000,000.

In 1932 we lost $47,000,000,000, or a total of $92,000,000,000 in three years, an average of thirty billions each year. This is the destructive cost of our poverty.

WHAT HAVE WE REALLY SAVED?

It is pertinent to inquire what we have saved in these three years as a result of our much-discussed economy program.

The Seventy-first Congress appropriated $10,250,000,000. The Seventy-second Congress has appropriated approximately ten billions.

In other words, on a basis of the actual appropriations this economy program has achieved the saving of one-quarter of $1,000,000,000, while we have been losing $90,000,000,-000. That is, we saved $1 while we were losing $368. What very remarkable economy that is! At that rate how long will it take us to restore prosperity? Why do we not awaken to the fact that scrimping and pinching is not our way out? of the rich men of this country were not willing to pay even Why do we not see clearly that if we were able to cut out every cent of Government expense—wipe out the full five billions a year which we have been expending—we would still be losing a minimum of twenty-five billions a year more than we would be saving? Why can we not see clearly that the cost of Government is not our great difficulty, but that it is the loss of national income which is bringing disaster. There is where our trouble lies. That is the question up for solution

And now note that there never has been a national deficit in peace time when the national income remained stationery or increased. But that there is always a deficit in those years when the national income largely decreased.

RESTORE THE NATIONAL INCOME

If we restore the national income, our present tax rates will not only automatically balance the Budget but will produce a surplus that will quickly pay off the deficits of the past three years. And it ought to be equally plain that if we do not restore the national income we can not possibly balance the Budget or hope to restore prosperity. We can not pinch and scrimp our way out. We have been and still are trying to save what we have not received. We are trying to balance our Budget with a minus sign.

MUST CREATE WEALTH BEFORE WE CAN CONSERVE IT

We must create wealth before we can conserve it. Ability to pay national taxes depends primarily on national income. It is, of course, one of the common sense, universally accepted principles of even primary economics, to put or keep taxes up during periods of prosperity, and take from wealth sufficient to balance the Budget and to pay the deficit of former years. If this rule had been followed immediately after the war, every bond, every long-time or short-time note of the United States would have been paid before the fatal stock panic of October, 1929, fell upon us. If our statesmen had at the same time observed the approach and growth of unemployment resulting from labor-saving machinery, we could have provided employment for these men as they were dispossessed, and at the same time actually increased the national income very largely. But our Secretary of the Treasury and our Congress professed actually to believe that the way to make the poor man rich was to reduce the rich man's taxes. In the face of such downright governmental stupidity, or worse, is it any wonder the Nation is on the verge of financial collapse? Balancing the Budget is entirely dependent on restoring the national income. Over a series of years, of course, the Budget must be balanced. But it is sheer nonsense to insist on doing it this year or any other given year under financial depression. It is not a matter of even grave importance, much less of vital import in our national life. It is the part of good economics to make up national deficits by bonds when the national income is low. And to pay off those bonds and balance the Budget through taxation when the national income is normal or high. Failure to balance the Budget never has destroyed our credit or shaken public confidence in the forty-nine times it has occurred, and, of course, it is not going to now. That is not our trouble at all. I have devoted so much time to this matter of balancing the Budget only because the public press has, over many months, given these budgeteers so much space in which to say much about nothing.

BUDGET BALANCING-A NATIONAL HYSTERIA

The ominous implication is, this whole nation-wide hysteria over balancing the Budget appears to be the result of a concerted move on the part of "big business" interests—a well-planned propaganda—to accomplish certain very definite results: First, to compel acceptance of their own continued control of governmental policies; second, to keep on raising enough dust, if possible, to cover up their tracks by preventing the necessary investigations to show what brought about the panic and the ensuing depression; and third, to prevent the people from learning who profited by it, to what extent, and at whose expense.

But let me here suggest what must be plain to most men—that Government permitted this terrible condition to come upon us. Government could have prevented this nation—wide poverty. Government can restore prosperity. Government can prevent the recurrence of panics and depressions. If this present Government can not do these things, it is futile, it is useless, and will necessarily pass away and be replaced by some Government that can and will do these vitally necessary things.

Broadly speaking, it is true that there is never overproduction but only underconsumption because of our stupid barriers against exchange of commodities, our lack of means of distribution, our disregard of the right of men to participate in the possible advantages resulting from human effort and invention. We are fooling away our time preventing starvation. We ought to be devoting every effort to providing for the production of wealth. It will cost in the long run infinitely more to do charity than it would to assure jobs.

FURTHER IRRETRIEVABLE LOSSES CAN BE PREVENTED

Our national income for 1914 was $33,000,000,000. Then, for the next 15 years it increased steadily every year till it reached a minimum of $85,000,000,000 in 1928, and again in 1929-$327,000,000 each working day, $40,000,000 national income each hour of work. Then, on October 23, 1929, came the thunderbolt. Stocks on the New York Stock Exchange crashed. A nation-wide panic resulted. Then the inevitable depression followed by its savage poverty, destitution, and despair. The national income fell $92,000,000,000 in three and a half years. Half that vast sum was the loss of wages by the unemployed, an irretrievable loss, for unemployment fell just as national income fell. The two inevitably go together, because national income depends on men at work. It necessarily follows that national income can not be restored unless and until men are put to work. If, therefore, we provide jobs we provide national income also. With restoration of national income we automatically balance our Budget, meet our taxes without difficulty, and proceed on our way in prosperity. Then if we are wise enough and courageous enough to prevent the repetition of those conditions which have invariably resulted in panic we make prosperity permanent. That very thing is certainly within our

It is this national income that must be restored. This is the one absolute necessity and the one that is being completely ignored by our political leaders. It is evident to any thinking mind that we have all the resources at our command that we have ever had; that we have the power to again use them certainly to as great advantage as ever before; that, with greater intelligence and courage, we can use those resources to produce vastly greater wealth, higher rate of employment, better living conditions, more leisure, learning, and opportunity for growth and service; that the power to direct and actually bring about these things through intelligence applied unselfishly lies entirely in the hands of government will be as readily accepted by all who understands the objects and uses of government; that our own Government already possesses and has over a long period already asserted and exercised these powers is also generally known. It only requires purpose to vision and courage to exercise these powers of government to cure the present conditions and prevent their recurrences, and any less a design would be unworthy of a great government.

THE FIRST DUTY OF GOVERNMENT

The first duty of government is to see to the providing of the opportunity for a job for every man and woman who wants to work. The public-works program must be of sufficient extent to take up the surplus labor and keep it employed until we can do away with that surplus. The labor surplus that existed in 1929 was and now is solely in technologically unemployed, amounting in that year to 2,000,000 men. Perfectly clearly, if this surplus is given employment, or taken out of competition with other labor, and conditions equal to those of 1929 are restored, there will be a job for every man and woman who wants to work. But just as clearly also, 2,000,000 may not be given permanent work in building permanent national improvements. Also equally clearly, technological unemployment will increase just as inventions, processes, applications of power, and methods of administration develop. It therefore becomes necessary that we not only remove this present technological surplus from competitive labor but that we also provide against the new surplus which will constantly recur. There is no single method that will accomplish this, but there are a series of actions that will certainly remove the present surplus and prevent the recurrence of any surplus over a period of years.

Therefore let us address ourselves to this one vital matter—restoring the national income and making it permanent. To restore national income, we must create more wealth. To create more wealth, we must employ more labor. In short, we must provide for turning the present human energy now idle into the production of wealth. The full use of this wasted energy would provide a job for every man and woman who wants to work and create a national income higher than any yet reached. We can do that very thing and make that income permanent. To accomplish this and make it permanent requires a program of action embracing three general divisions:

A PROGRAM FOR ACTION Public works

First. We must inaugurate a public-works program of sufficient scope, and provide for keeping it in operation for a sufficient length of time, to automatically put all our idle men to work. The program that drives at anything less than permanent universal employment is not worth the effort.

Government control of currency and credits

Second. The Government must take and keep control of the currency and credits of the country for the benefit of all the people of the country; denying and preventing control or manipulation to those persons and organizations now known as international bankers, who use that control for their own selfish interest alone.

Government control of the stock markets

Third. The Government must, through effective laws simple to formulate and easy to enforce, prevent gambling in the industry of the country. It must prevent the destruction of business, the annihilation of industry, the loss of jobs to men, and the lives of those dependent on those jobs. This done, there would be no precipitation of panics. The cause removed and precipitation prevented, there would be no future panics with their inevitable depressions, with the resulting chaos, poverty, and destitution.

NO PICAYUNE POLICY CAN CURE NATIONAL POVERTY

No picayune policy can cure national poverty. No one law can do all these things. It will probably require a series of laws to meet each one of these objects. It will require that the three series be thoroughly correlated. In considering this program we must put out of our minds the idea that we are enacting an emergency or relief program. We must at the outset understand that we are seeking to do permanent things, things that good business compels, that good government warrants. The labor to result must be incidental to the permanent results to be attained in providing universal employment. Many if not most of the laws required to solve this riddle have already been discussed by the Members of Congress. Several bills for part of them have been introduced. A few have actually passed the House. There are very few new ideas required to fully set out and connect up the entire plan. All I am hoping to do is to simplify and correlate the ideas which are already pretty well known to Congress. Let us take up and discuss the first of these three general divisions of the plan and outline the measures necessary to accomplish the first object sought, holding in mind that these projected laws shall lead to an actual and complete recovery from our present economic difficulties and prevent the recurrence of other panics with their inevitable financial depressions. At a later day I hope I may be permitted to discuss with my colleagues the last two divisions of this general program for action.

I here repeat the first object we are seeking is to inaugurate a public-works program of sufficient scope, and provide for keeping it in operation for a sufficient length of time, to automatically put all our idle men to work. A careful investigation has shown that there is sufficient public work now in sight to keep every surplus idle man in America at work for 50 years to come. It is not a question of supplying work for this part of the program. It is purely a question of supplying the means to pay for the work which is so sorely needed to be done.

WHAT CONSTITUTES OUR LABOR SURPLUS?

And what constitutes our labor surplus? Technological unemployment is that unemployment resulting from labor-saving machinery which will not be reemployed when we restore the rate of employment existing before the panic of 1929. There were 2,000,000 technologically unemployed when that panic came. This is the new element in our national economics. It constitutes our total permanent labor surplus, which must be disposed of before we can return to a state of permanent prosperity.

It is not sufficient that we only do away with the present 2,000,000 technologically unemployed. We must provide for a much larger ultimate number than that, so that sufficient time may intervene in which to work out a permanent method of preventing a surplus. Let us understand that a competitive surplus is a destructive force. Its power to destroy compares not in arithmetical but in geometrical ratio to the normal supply. This rule applies to men as well as to merchandise. We must, therefore, take men out of competitive production as a humane matter as well as an economic necessity. Then we must prevent its recurrence.

THE GUARANTY OF A JOB FOR EVERY MAN AND WOMAN WHO WANTS TO WORK

We must have a public-works program of permanent national improvements sufficient in extent to take up the technologically unemployed—our only actual labor surplus—and keep them employed until we can do away with that surplus. A public-works program of that extent will automatically put to work every other man now idle. Once all are at work, we must proceed to remove permanently this competitive surplus. But it is necessary not only that we eliminate the present competitive surplus but we must provide also against the ever-recurring new surplus through labor-saving machinery. The elimination of our 2,000,000 technological labor surplus will entail the doing of seven things, which will at the same time provide the reserve jobs necessary to absorb the otherwise recurring surplus.

Must have a child labor law

First. A child labor law, to eliminate at the beginning a half million of the children now in gainful employment, for reducing the present surplus by that much; and within a 10-year period to eliminate the entire number of 3,000,000 children now driven in industry, and thus provide two and a half million reserve jobs for the future.

Must provide Federal old-age pensions

Second. To provide a Federal old-age pension to eliminate from industry a half million men and women beyond the age of economic usefulness, reducing our present labor surplus by that number. Let us understand just here that we can never settle this question of unemployment without providing against child labor and old-age poverty.

Reduction of hours-Days per week

Third. Through the reduction of hours per day and days per week to eliminate sufficient time to equal the elimination of the remaining million surplus jobs without reducing wages. This reduction to be continued as rapidly as possible without lowering the wage scale. It is essential that all wage scales be restored, so as to make the gross amount of wages as high as or higher than ever before, if we are to pay our debts. We can not restore prices without restoring wages. We can not pay our debts without restoring prices.

Place farming on profitable basis

Fourth. By placing farming on a profitable basis to prevent a quarter of a million farmers from leaving the farms annually in normal times and entering into competition with men already engaged in industry. This, it will be observed, will amount to two and a half million more reserve jobs in a 10-year period.

Women in industry

Fifth. There are 44,000,000 men and women engaged in gainful employment. Of this number 11,000,000 are women. The great proportion of these women are not in industry because they desire to be but because they are compelled to be. The moment a job for every man and woman who wants to work is assured, and that is easily and certainly attainable through the five points above referred to, the women engaged in industry will begin gladly to drop out of competition with the men whom they love and whom they naturally and properly desire to marry. Surely in a 10-year period this will supply no less than 5,000,000 other reserve

Return foreigners not entitled to citizenship

Sixth. The return to their native country of the 2,000,000 foreigners not entitled to citizenship under our laws will add that many more reserve jobs.

Improve living conditions-We will help labor

Seventh. The constant improvement in living conditions will, compared to our present, add enormously to the use of labor. The actual surplus now available, 12,000,000, through the points above suggested is so large that it will require many years to absorb this through labor-saving machinery. This period will give plenty of time in which to work out the adjustments necessary to the final solution, provided we understand the necessity and justification for and insist upon providing for the right of man to labor and to live as a national duty.

A CHALLENGE TO THE UNBELIEVER

I challenge those who do not believe these things possible, to say what is possible. I challenge those who object to this plan to propose a better plan. I shall accept no other answer as adequate. It is indeed in the hope of calling forth a better plan that I offer this one, and my challenge is only to my colleagues for the service of our country.

NOT NECESSARY TO PUT 12,000,000 TO WORK ON FEDERAL PROJECTS

A public-works program of that extent will automatically put to work every other man now idle. It will not be necessary of course to put the whole 12,000,000 now idle to work for the Government, but only to put the present surplus to work in noncompetitive labor. The others will go back to their old jobs automatically. The moment that is done, the ability to purchase will be fully restored, provided the currency to carry on business and reestablish credits is provided. Under these conditions restoration of commodity price levels will ensue and all other prices will rise to their legitimate levels. With the restoration of farm commodity prices the loss of homes will cease, and taxes will be met without difficulty.

TWO FORCES CONSTANTLY AT WORK

There are two forces constantly at work-one limiting jobs by increasing production by machinery—the other increasing demand as the result of increasing ability to buy. The first will depend on the continued advancement of inventions for labor-saving machinery. The second will depend upon the larger division of the wealth produced in favor of the producer. The first will depend on individual enterprise-the second on the wisdom and courage of government.

OPPOSED TO MANUFACTURERS' SALES TAX

If we should pass the much-advertised manufacturers' sales tax and it should yield the $600,000,000 estimated for it yet that amount would not feed the ever-increasing idle millions next year. Why do we not awake to the fact that within a 2-year period the National Government will be spending more money to prevent starvation than it will be able to raise in revenue from all sources—unless we put men to work creating wealth. This is necessarily true because individual givers to charity, communities, municipalities, counties, and States are increasingly unable to keep up former contributions, while the number requiring support is increasing at an alarming rate.

WE ARE POOR ONLY BECAUSE WE ARE IDLE

Why do we not open our eyes to the fact that we are the utter futility of the idea that we can possibly starve through this economic chaos? Unless we are willing to paralyze government in many of its most useful activitiesunless we are willing to retreat in our civilization—unless we are willing to give up the improved living conditions which many years of struggle have brought us; unless we are willing to sacrifice much of that greatest of all our achievements, the advantage which universal education has brought us; unless we admit the futility and uselessness of government; we must set about putting men to work restoring national income, and resuming our normal life.

A PLAN CONTAINED IN H. R. 13994

I should not have delivered this address unless I had worked out a plan to meet these difficulties. On January 3 I introduced a bill in this House (H. R. 13994). That bill provides a public-works program nation-wide in extent. It would put 2,000,000 men to work on noncompetitive lines alone within 12 months. This in turn would put all the otherwise idle men to work in the regular lines of industry. The details of all this plan are set out clearly in the bill itself. I have not just put up an idea, but have also provided for the money to carry out this great program. Every detail of that is provided for.

THE UNEMPLOYED ARE WILLING TO PAY SHYLOCK'S PRICE

I fought the manufacturers' sale tax bitterly when it was presented to the last Congress, and I will fight it again if it comes up, because the proceeds of that tax would be used only to relieve the rich from the burden of government which they ought to bear, and transfer it to the poor, who can not, ought not, and shall not bear it. The unemployed and the distressed are willing, however, to pay Shylock's price at the retail counters of America for the opportunity to work, but for no other purpose. My bill collects at the counters of Wall Street as well as at those of the crossroads store.

IF YOU REALLY WANT A SALES TAX, HERE IS YOUR OPPORTUNITY

I am not more friendly to a sales tax now than I was last year, but I have talked intimately with many of the idle men of our country. I have just put the question frankly to them, as well as to the men who are still at work, whether they would be willing to pay a turn-over, or terminal tax, of 1 or 2 or 3 per cent provided the money be used solely for the purpose of putting the idle men to work. Everyone has agreed heartily with that program. This turn-over sales tax of 1 per cent would bring two and a half billions of dollars the first year and increase to double that amount as normal conditions should return. This sum would put 2,000,000 men to work within a year and keep them at work until we learn to adjust ourselves to the coming period of economic equality.

CONGRESS HAS WORKED ALONG RIGHT LINES

As an indication of the length along right lines to which this Congress has already gone, outside the necessity of putting men to work. I here desire to digress for a moment to point out our proper path and suggest:

THE GOLDSBOROUGH BILL PROVIDES NATIONAL MONETARY POLICY

We must have a national monetary policy before we can hope to drive toward permanent prosperity. The Goldsborough bill provides that.

We must restore prices or we can not pay our debts. That entails beyond question the expansion of currency, the limit of which can be safely set. A number of bills have been put forward for this purpose, out of all of which can be written a bill to cover this very important matter.

STEAGALL BANK GUARANTY BILL SOUND AND ESSENTIAL

We must reestablish the national credit stream before we can hope to carry on the business of normal years. The Steagall bank-depositors' guaranty bill in an improved form undoubtedly offers the same certain and inevitable way to accomplish that purpose.

JONES FARM ALLOTMENT BILL OFFERS PROPER METHOD TO HELP FARMER

We must, in due course, work out rationally the farmers' allotment plan to equalize the economic conditions of the farmers with other divisions of industry. The Jones bill poor only because we are idle? Why do we not awaken to offers the proper method and can be worked out successfully.

CONGRESS REALLY TOGETHER ON FUNDAMENTALS

These references are made to show clearly how near together this Congress really is on the fundamentals of the second division of the work outlined in this address. It only lacks conference on the part of this body to enable it to formulate the necessary national policies for the rehabilitation of the country. The rules and customs of the Congress must be so modified as to bring about consideration of national matters, which is our chief duty and service, instead of wasting 85 per cent of our time in pettifogging over totally unimportant details that should not come upon the floor of this House at all.

OUGHT TO MODIFY RULES AND CUSTOMS OF NEXT CONGRESS

It is an easy and simple matter to provide for this very thing by modifying the rules and customs of Congress for the next session.

WE CAN SELL BONDS

I want it understood that personally I am not one of those who believe we can not sell all the bonds we need to carry on this work. I do not agree with the international bankers who seek by fear to control the actions of Congress in the interest of American people. I know we can sell the bonds. But there is one thing we have to do, and we have to do it now, and that is to begin immediately to put men to work so that by the coming autumn the revival of work will be so far along that the dread of winter will be vanishing. I, therefore, am proposing this sales tax, and I recommend the study of the plan to my colleagues and to the American people. The plan is worked out in sufficient detail that the wisdom gained by experience by the Members older in service in this body can very easily whip it into practical shape.

I shall reintroduce this bill the first day of next session, first submitting it to the committee for study during the coming recess. I regret that the time at my command does not permit a detailed statement of this bill. But those who are interested will have no difficulty in getting a full understanding of the plan from the bill itself. For convenience I am appending a summary of this bill at the end of this address.

WE MUST DECLARE A POLICY

No matter what anyone may say, having now no policy for a way out, we must declare one. Having now only a policy resulting in the starvation of the many, we must declare one that will result in plenty for all. Having now in force only the policy which results in millions of men in enforced idleness, we must declare a policy that will put them all to work. Having now only the policy which results in business stagnation, we must declare one which will start and keep the wheels of industry rolling. Having now only the policy which results in the improverishment of life for lack of money, we must declare one that will provide all the money necessary to carry on life, to pay debts, and assure the success of the future. No matter what any one may say, having now only policies which result in evident failure, we must boldly declare other policies which give hope of success. Failure to do this is to admit our stupidity, our lack of courage, and absence of faith. Either this Congress can remedy these conditions or it can not. The moment it decides it can not, it ought to resign and let the people choose another body of men who believe in themselves and in our country and let them do it.

COST OF MAINTAINING OUR IDLE WILL EAT UP TAX INCREASE

The cost of maintaining 50,000,000 idle men, women, and children next year will more than eat up any possible tax increase we can make under present conditions. This childish fraud on our intelligence of lending money to States and their political subdivisions by the National Government ought not longer to deceive anyone. We must awaken to the fact that all industry is national. That the ultimate responsibility of caring for the unemployed is therefore also national, and that we must meet that responsibility nationally. Let us at least look the matter straight in the face.

WHO WILL MAKE UP THE SEVENTY-FOURTH CONGRESS

Men are not going to starve in the presence of plenty. If we continue to talk nonsense and fail to put men to work, they will ultimately take what they must have. Of course they will. We are in a new day, economically, and if this or the coming Congress fails to awaken to that fact and provide for new conditions through new laws, the Seventyfourth Congress will be made up of men who will do the required new things with a vengeance. To them the gold standard, deficits, budgets, income taxes, our institutions would all look alike. They would recognize outside the law of the land what we still have the opportunity of recognizing within the law of the land-that is, that the first duty of government is to provide the opportunity for men to live by their labor. And if we fail in that object through the ordinary means, we must directly provide that opportunity by the Government itself. There is no limit to the extent to which the Government may go to attain this object. This consuming poverty is not the fault of the States or cities or counties or villages or communities. And those political subdivisions of this Nation have no power to correct their evils. We must see that our difficulties are national in their origin. We must apply national remedies.

LABOR AND FARMER INTERESTS INTERLOCKED

Thirty per cent of our population still reside on the farms, though farming has been economically outlawed for a generation. Farming must be reinstated. We can not have permanent city prosperity and farm poverty anymore than we can have permanent farm prosperity and city poverty. It is as important to the laborer in New York as it is to the farmer in Illinois that that farmer shall have good crops and receive fair prices for them. It is equally important to the Illinois farmer as it is to the laborer in New York that that laborer shall have steady employment at fair wages. Each is actually dependent on the other. All who produce wealth are directly dependent on all other producers of wealth.

Naturally it follows that the first aid to the farmer is also the first aid to the whole country; that the permanent cure of this devastating poverty complex is a nation-wide cure including men of all callings. When this is clear to us we are ready to consider for a moment the application of special remedies to special conditions. The allotment plan is to be more or less effective as the first step toward equalizing opportunity for the farmer in transferring a part of the income from the industrial workers to the farmers. This is justifiable because the farmers, on the average, are actually much worse off economically than the industrial workers. It provides at least a better distribution of poverty—a fairer division of destitution.

THE DIVISION OF POVERTY

It avowedly creates no wealth. It makes no pretense of increasing purchasing power. It takes part of the purchasing power from poverty-stricken labor and hands it over gratis to create a larger purchasing power for penurized farmers. And be it observed that labor agrees to the transfer for the sake of their fellow producers of wealth. Because men are coming more and more to understand the identity of interest among all who produce wealth, and are increasingly willing to sacrifice for one another. It is just that much better than nothing, so far as immediate expectations are concerned. But it is tremendously important as a step leading toward the ultimate solution of the farm problem. Because that solution must entail a full understanding of the intimate relation, if not actual identity of interest, among all producers of wealth. The willingness of labor to share its crust with its still less fortunate fellow laborer, the farmer, lights the way.

ALL REMEDIES INEFFECTIVE UNLESS WE PUT MEN TO WORK

But living prices, debt-paying prices, home-redeeming prices can not come until we put men to work creating new wealth upon which we may live and thrive. We may pass a perfect law for remedying the ills of the farmer—but it will remain largely ineffective until we put men to work. You may pass the most effective law providing for expansion of the currency—but you can not put that money to the best use until you pay it over to men for work. You may lower the interest rate—and that is one of the primary requirements of the present case—but unless you put men to work starvation will continue. You may refinance the nine billion of farm mortgages at 1½ per cent, but the farmers could not even pay that unless we put men to work. You may do all these things, but all of them taken together will be in vain unless you put men to work. To labor and to live is the primary right of mankind. To provide the opportunity is the first duty of government. The first law of economics is embodied in that right.

WE MUST ACT—BUT ALWAYS WITH THE RIGHTS OF MEN BEFORE US

Most of the time spent discussing details on the floor of this House ought to be spent presenting to one another suggestions for putting our idle millions to work; for preventing future unemployment; for preventing the robbery of those who produce; for protecting all the millions of producers of wealth against the greed of the manipulating few who produce nothing; for guaranteeing a job for every man and woman who wants to work; for recognition of industry as national; for national guaranty against injury in industry; for child labor laws; for national old-age pensions; for industrial pensions along all lines of industry, always with the rights of men before us as the paramount interest of Government. Through law, we have set the income on money invested along all lines. We have guaranteed to a remarkable extent security to investment and a fair return on dollars. But through law, we have made no effort to guarantee income on labor along any line. We have made no move to guarantee security of the homes of men who produce the wealth. The time has come when we must recognize the duty of the Government to guarantee the opportunity for a job for every man and woman who wants to work; a fair return on that labor in all those things that go to make up human life. We must in turn make all those things secure—permanent—always available, an endless source of wealth for all who labor.

SUMMARY OF THE KELLER PUBLIC WORKS BILL

Creates an administration of public works. Transfers work now done by the Engineer Department of the Army on rivers and harbors to the administration of public works. Also transfers the following departments: Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, Board of Engineers of New York City, Supervisor of the Harbor of New York, the United States engineer offices, the Mississippi River Commission, California Débris Commission, the Board of Road Commissioners for Alaska, the Alaska Telegraph and Cable System, Northern and Northwestern Lake Survey, and municipal functions pertaining to the District of Columbia to the administration of public works. The Reclamation Service from the Interior Department; the Supervising Architect from the Treasury Department, the Bureau of Public Roads from the Department of Agriculture, all to the administration of public works.

Provides a limited and controlled expansion of the currency by authorizing issue of $1,000,000,000 in Liberty notes. Directs the Secretary of the Treasury to keep such issue on parity with other money as provided in the gold standard act of 1900.

Directs the administrator to appoint board to study and report on the construction of ship canal from Gulf of Mexico to confluence of Ohio and Mississippi Rivers, a project which would put hundreds of thousands to work and which would develop the interior of the United States to the great advantage of present railroad transportation.

Appropriates money for river and harbor improvements, public buildings, irrigation and drainage projects, repair and remodeling of existing buildings, Federal highways and elimination of grade crossings. Permits loans from tax receipts at no interest to cities and States for highway construction, bridges, water supply and sewerage works, flying fields, parks and playgrounds, public buildings, and other construction of public and semipublic nature. For loans to limited dividend corporations engaged in building housing projects for low-salaried levels. No interest would be charged for these loans. Provides board to act on all such applications, with provisions for amortization of all loans.

Levies tax of 1 per cent on the agreed price of every transfer of goods, chattels, and property, and/or any rights to goods, chattels, and property. No exemptions are permitted.

Tax covered into Treasury in special fund known as the "public works fund." This fund available only for payment of projects authorized in bill or under terms of the bill. Funds also authorized for retirement on account of injury or age.

Levies an additional 2 per cent tax on all incomes in excess of $5,000.

Main provisions of bill effective immediately upon passage; transfer of departments within 30 days.

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 14458) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, and for other purposes, and I ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 14458) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 7, 8, 9, and 11, and agree to the same.

C. A. WOODRUM,
JNO. J. BOYLAN,
JOHN W. SUMMERS,
Managers on the part of the House.

REED SMOOT,
HENRY W. KEYES,
FREDERICK HALE,
ROYAL S. COPELAND,
CARTER GLASS,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on amendments Nos. 7, 8, 9, and 11 of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 14458) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, and for other purposes, submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon and recommended in the accompanying conference report as to each of such amendments, namely:

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION

On No. 7: Appropriates $1,081,500 as proposed by the Senate, instead of $500,000 as proposed by the House, for general expenses of the Federal Trade Commission, and retains the Senate language which provides that $280,000 of the appropriation shall be available for the completion of the publicutilities investigations undertaken pursuant to Senate Resolution No. 83, Seventieth Congress.

On No. 8: Appropriates $20,000, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $10,000, as proposed by the House, for printing and binding for the Federal Trade Commission.

On No. 9: Corrects the total for the Federal Trade Commission to correspond with the action taken on amendments Nos. 7 and 8.

On No. 11: Corrects the total for the entire bill to correspond with the action taken on amendments Nos. 7 and 8.

C. A. WOODRUM,
JNO. J. BOYLAN,
JOHN W. SUMMERS,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I move to recede and concur in the Senate amendments, and on that I ask recognition.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia is recognized

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, this conference report, if adopted by the House, will dispose of the independent offices appropriation bill, so far as the House is concerned. The only subject in disagreement is the appropriation for the Federal Trade Commission, and if the motion that I have made is adopted by the House to recede and concur in the Senate amendment, it means to give to the Federal Trade Commission $1,089,000, which is the amount that the Budget originally estimated for its activity. In justification of the action of the conferees in making its surrender to the body at the other end of the Capitol, let me say that the conferees feel that a bill as important as the independent offices appropriation bill ought not to fail of passage because of a difference of this sort between the two bodies. It was perfectly apparent that our friends at the other end of the Capitol were adamant and would not yield on the matter. Under the authority given the incoming President to discontinue functions and decrease activities in departments, there will be ample opportunity for the new President and the new administration to control this appropriation in any way they see fit, and while the conferees, both of the House and the Senate, I may say, were unanimously of opinion that the appropriation was unjustified to some extent, yet for the reason that I have indicated we yielded, and I hope it will be the pleasure of the House to allow the bill to become a

Mr. Speaker, while I have the floor for just a few moments I want to say a few words, a few kind words, I hope, in behalf of a group of much-discussed and much-cussed and much-maligned gentlemen who are to-day Members of this body, but who in 24 hours from now will pass out of this picture, and who, for the want of some more opprobious term, the public has denominated lame ducks. When the Speaker drops the gavel to-morrow at 12 o'clock noon the previous question will have been moved and agreed to on the Seventy-second Congress. The last speech will have been made, the last vote taken, and the curtain will go down on a momentous legislative session, and, what is more than that, there will pass out from official life into the ranks of private citizens many very distinguished and able public servants. To me the ending of a session of this kind has something of tragedy in it. I might take the roll, and time does not permit, and call the names of some of the great men on both sides of the aisle who will pass out of Congress to-morrow. As the hour of 12 approaches to-morrow, I am very happy in the thought that probably for once during this great session, when at many times passion and feeling have been at high tide, there will be a few moments when we can be just ordinary, everyday men, when we will dare, if you please, to pay just tribute to our colleagues, even though we may differ politically.

As I look on the Republican side of this House, I am reminded that many of our dear personal friends will be absent when our new organization calls the Congress into session shortly. The vicissitudes of politics often work very queer tricks in the affairs of men and in the affairs of nations, and as I look into the faces of you gentlemen, many of whom will leave us to-morrow, I am sure you go back to your private lives very happy in the thought and in the consolation that during the years that you have served here, and some have been here for many years, you have rendered distinguished, able, and conspicuous service to your country.

I look into the face of my distinguished and venerable friend from Indiana [Mr. Wood], who was chairman of the Committee on Appropriations; that great warrior, who can reason with such unerring logic and such forceful eloquence on every topic on which he might engage in debate except one—and that is politics. Will Wood is irresistible, except when he begins to talk politics, and then he goes haywire. [Laughter.] But, gentlemen, no man has ever served in this body whose heart and whose life were more seriously dedicated to the public service than the gentleman from Indiana, who leaves us to-morrow. We shall miss him. [Applause.]

Then I turn over here to my side of the aisle, to my colleague on the Committee on Appropriations, the gentleman from Georgia, Judge Wright, who retires voluntarily from Congress. He is one of those rare birds that you might say commit political suicide. He retires voluntarily. Some of us can not understand that, perhaps, but we admire his courage, and I am sure that distinguished man will go back to his constituency with consolation in knowing of his long and useful service.

Then I see our distinguished friend over here from Wisconsin, the fiery and impetuous guardian of the Public Treasury, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Stafford]. [Applause.] Oftentimes we have not agreed with him, many times we have cussed him, sometimes audibly, often inaudibly; and also his running mate, the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. LaGuardia]. [Applause.] Oftentimes we have differed with him; but may I say of these two gentlemen that I do not believe there is anyone in this House who has ever doubted their devotion to public service, their sincerity, or their patriotism. [Applause.]

Then I see my distinguished colleague on the Committee on Appropriations, Doctor Summers of Washington. [Applause.] Why, gentlemen, I might turn back the pages of time some 18 or 20 years and picture to you a stalwart, bright-eyed lad, with agile step, who had equipped himself for the practice of medicine by studying in the best universities in America, in Germany, and in Vienna, who, lured and tempted by a desire to serve in public office, came to the Halls of Congress.

Then I would turn to-morrow, when the gavel falls, to our distinguished friend who goes out of this body and I say again that oftentimes the vicissitudes of politics come to us in the guise of stark tragedy. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. Summers] has rendered distinguished public service during his service in Congress, and he will be missed. There are many others, on both sides whose names I might call. All of you gentlemen will be missed. We hope as you go out into your several ways that an abundance of peace, happiness, and prosperity will attend your ways. We hope that many times your thoughts will turn back again to these old days here when we gathered in friendly competition and in friendly rivalry, and that in fancy you will turn again to the halls of Congress, here to mingle in spirit with these friends of to-day.

Gentlemen, I would not be true to my sentiments if I did not, as I take my seat, pay my humble homage and tribute to the gentleman who goes out of this body to-morrow, having been called to a higher service at a time when the fate of the Nation and perhaps the civilized world is hanging in the balance. I refer to the greatest Roman of them all, the distinguished Speaker of this House. [Applause.] My colleagues, when he drops the gavel here at 12 o'clock to-morrow and wends his way down the hall that carries him into another body, I am sure he will leave his heart at this end of the Capitol. I believe I can voice the sentiment of every Member of this body when I say there will be a feeling of sadness in the heart of every Member who stays here. Many is the time when a lump will come in our throats and a heavy feeling in our hearts when we think of the good old days when he walked among us in | House asked for a conference on the Senate amendments. this body, and when our hearts were gladdened and inspired by his genial presence.

Now, gentlemen, you may have heard that last night the Democrats had a little caucus, a little meeting, so to speak. and a little row, a sort of a friendly fight, but I want to say to you good Republicans, those few of you who will be here from now on, that you can not get any consolation of what happened last night. Like the Greeks of old, we might fight and raise the devil when we are in the bosom of our own family, but when the bugle calls to war and we meet you on the firing line, I think I can say to you that under the leadership of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] [applause] and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Byrns] [applause], and the other chosen leaders of the Democratic Party in this House, you will find the Democratic Party of a single mind and a single voice, with a driving power and driving force here ready to carry through the program of our President elect. [Applause.]

In the coming days, gentlemen, I want to suggest to my genial friend from New York [Mr. SNELL] the same kind of doctrine that he preached to us some months ago, that in this crisis there ought to be friendly cooperation, regardless of political differences, and I am going to venture the hope that that will come to pass, that although there may be an imaginary aisle down here or perhaps over here separating the two parties, yet the heart of every man in this body will be overburdened and overshadowed by the plight of our country, that we may go forward with steadfast determination to bring back a condition when the skies will smile again upon this great land that all of us love so much. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the conference report.

The previous question was ordered. The conference report was agreed to.

TEMPORARY COMMITTEE ON ACCOUNTS

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following appointment:

Pursuant to section 97, Chapter 4, Title 2, United States Code, the Chair appoints as a temporary Committee on Accounts the gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. WARREN, and the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. Cochran, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. Wolfenden.

JOINT COMMITTEE ON PRINTING

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following further appointment:

Pursuant to section 2, Title 44, United States Code, the Chair appoints as members of the Joint Committee on Printing the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. RAMSPECK, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. RICH.

NATIONAL PARK AND PLANNING COMMISSION

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following further appointment:

Pursuant to the provisions of section 71 (a), Title 40, United States Code, Supplement VI, the Chair appoints the lady from New Jersey, Mrs. Norton, as a member of the National Capital Park and Planning Commission.

PRICE HUFF

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 11035) for the relief of Price Huff, with Senate amendments, and ask unanimous consent to vacate the proceedings whereby the House requested a conference on the Senate amendments, and concur in the Senate amendments.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendments, as follows:

Page 1, line 7, strike out the words "discharged under honorable conditions" and insert "honorably discharged," and on page 1, strike out lines 10 and 11 and down to the word "thereto," in line 8, on page 2, and insert in lieu thereof "back pay, compensation, benefit, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to vacate the proceedings whereby the

Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House concur in the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, there are many outgoing Members who wish to address their colleagues before they go. In order to enable them all to do so, I ask unanimous consent that when the House takes a recess to-day it recess to 10 o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, there is liable to be an important conference report on one of the supply bills that may not be ready to present to the House before late to-night. Could not the gentleman make it 9 o'clock a. m.?

Mr. RAINEY. I do not believe so.

Mr. BLANTON. We have in other years stayed in session all night on March 3, and all the next morning to 12 o'clock.

Mr. RAINEY. I know; we have done that several times. The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for eight minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

WILLIS CHAPMAN HAWLEY

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, we are approaching the close of another Congress. An extra session of the new Congress will undoubtedly be called soon-I do not know how soonbut only a few hours of this session remain and we have here on the floor many of our friends with whom we have had pleasant contacts and pleasant relations who will not be with us in the next Congress. We regret their passing.

To-day I want to address the House particularly with reference to my personal friend the Hon. WILLIS CHAPMAN

HAWLEY, of the State of Oregon. [Applause.]

For 24 years I have been closely associated with him. We have not been able to agree on tariff matters, but there has been no bitterness and no feeling of unfriendliness between us.

At all times during his long period of service here he has been an efficient, hard-working, patriotic Member of this body. He goes away now leaving behind him none but friends. He has never made an enemy in this House. He has never said an unkind word during his 24 years of service against any Member of this House, no matter how heated the debate was. He has participated in the great debates of the last decade. Those of us who have been associated with him during all the period of time he has been here personally regret parting with him now.

A true son of the great West, born in Oregon of parents who crossed the plains in a covered wagon, educated in the schools of his native State and in Willamette University, he has imbibed and absorbed the atmosphere of the West. He belongs to that great section of this country. He has represented well here in this House those interests. He has stood always for what he conceived to be the things which would most benefit the great section of the United States in which he lives.

During a large part of his life he had been engaged in educational work. He was president of Willamette University, from which he graduated. After his name he can write a long string of degrees conferred by that university and other universities.

He served on important commissions in this House. He served as the chairman of the great Committee on Ways and Means of the House. He inaugurated in that committee a policy of kindly treatment for every man on the committee and for every witness who appeared before it, and they all received the fairest treatment at his hands. I am sure the policies of fairness and courtesy to which he adhered will be continued through the future Congresses.

We will miss him. We will miss his kindly face. We will miss the companionship of this cultured, educated, scholarly gentleman. He goes back now to private life and we wish him good luck, good health, and long life. [Applause.]

JOINT COMMITTEE ON VETERANS' BENEFITS

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 262, to continue the joint committee on veterans' benefits.

The Clerk read the Senate joint resolution, as follows:

Senate Joint Resolution 262

Resolved, etc., That for the purpose of continuing the investigation with respect to the operation of laws and regulations relating to the relief of veterans authorized under section 701, of Part II of the legislative appropriation act, fiscal year 1933, and to report the results of such investigation, those members of the joint committee to investigate the operation of the laws and regulations relating to the relief of veterans who are members elect to the Seventy-third Congress, or a majority of them, after March 4, 1933, and until 60 days after the first meeting day of the Seventy-third Congress, are authorized and directed as a committee, by subcommittee or otherwise, to continue the investigation begun under authority of such section 701. Such committee shall have the same powers and duties as the committee provided for under such section 701.

Mr. SNELL and Mr. RANKIN rose.

Mr. SNELL. May I ask a question? Do I understand this resolution just continues the committee we established last year in order to complete its work?

Mr. McDUFFIE. That is correct.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Yes.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Will there be any preliminary report submitted to this Congress?

Mr. McDUFFIE. No report to this Congress. Unfortunately, the committee has not been able to work out an intelligent report. There are various opinions and schools of thought represented on the committee. We believe that with proper time allotted we can sit around the board and bring to the Congress something that may be helpful.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Has the committee finished its labors on fact finding?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Yes; the committee has concluded its hearings. One volume of the hearings has not been printed, however.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. McDuffie] admits they have completed their fact findings. We have a standing Committee on Veterans' Affairs, of which I happen to be the chairman. We have 21 members on that committee who have been studying this legislation for years. They are competent to handle this situation. Besides, as to the other veterans of the Spanish-American War and the Civil War, there are other standing committees of the House competent to handle that legislation. Therefore I see no reason now for rushing this legislation through to perpetuate this special committee in the dying days of this Congress. I think this legislation should be left to the standing committees created to handle it. Therefore I shall have to object.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Will the gentleman reserve his objection a moment?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes; I reserve it.

Mr. McDUFFIE. The gentleman, of course, understands this committee is not attempting to legislate. This committee is simply acting as the agent of the House and Senate to get the facts to submit to the gentleman's committee and to the Congress. We are not attempting to legislate. The gentleman knows that all the facts we find must ultimately go to his committee and to the other committees dealing with veterans of all wars.

Mr. RANKIN. I will say to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. McDuffie] that the Veterans' Committee is just as competent to hold these hearings and get this information as any select committee. Besides, we have men on the Veterans' Committee who have been there for the last eight or nine years, and they are familiar with every phase of veterans' legislation. This idea of having a select committee to get information to give some other committee information that they could get with less expense and with less trouble is simply time and labor thrown away.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. McDuffie]?

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the Senate joint resolution (S. J. Res. 262) to continue the Joint Committee on Veterans' Benefits.

The Clerk read the Senate joint resolution.

Mr. LUCE and Mr. RANKIN demanded a second.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Luce] opposed to the resolution?

Mr. LUCE. I am not.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not qualify.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi qualifies to demand a second.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. McDuffie] is recognized for 20 minutes and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] for 20 minutes.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Luce].

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, the House is entitled to know that the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation has now for two years been in control legitimately of the gentleman from Mississippi, who objects to the adoption of this resolution. In the two years I can not recall that the committee has been called together two times. It has been called together this session but once. I am not certain about the calls in the previous sessions. Not a single matter of grave importance to the veterans of this country has been laid before the committee for consideration.

We have had no opportunity to exercise the wisdom that the gentleman accredits to this committee. We have had no opportunity to pass judgment upon the great issues involving the veterans of the World War.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. Certainly.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is a member of the Veterans' Committee?

Mr. LUCE. I am.

Mr. RANKIN. Has the gentleman asked for a hearing on any bill at any time since I have been chairman of the committee?

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, the futility of making any such request has kept one of my modesty from presenting it. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman from Massachusetts knows he is in error. He would have been given a hearing if he had asked for one. The gentleman has not even introduced a bill.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, I have not been presumptuous—and I shall not in the next two years be presumptuous enough to lay down to a gentleman of the opposite party who is in control of the committee what his program should be. [Applause.] I have waited with patience, with two years of patience, for an opportunity to serve my country in this committee, but I have been denied the chance to do it.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman again yield?

Mr. LUCE. Certainly.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman is in error in both statements. In the first place, he has not been seeking any opportunity to serve his country on this committee, or he would be calling for hearings. I have not denied anybody a hearing. Every man who has asked for a hearing before the committee has got one, and if the gentleman from Massachusetts had asked for a hearing I would have given it to him; and during the next two years, if I am chairman of the committee, I shall be glad to give him all the hearings he needs.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Mississippi and I have now served in this Congress for a considerable length of time, and never before this morning have I seen him ready to disavow the possession of any power of initiative on his own part. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New York two minutes.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I believe that it is for the interest of every bona fide disabled veteran, in order to have the atmosphere cleared, that this committee should be continued and given time to submit its complete report. There is a great deal of misunderstanding in the country concerning veterans' relief and veterans' compensation. The only way that we can clear the atmosphere is for the committee to have time to submit its report at the earliest possible moment to the next Congress.

I understand fully the interest, zeal, and enthusiasm of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN]. He need not have any fears or misgivings, as the report will be submitted to his committee, which has jurisdiction over all veteran legislation. If there are abuses, if mistakes have been made, the only way we can protect the veterans is to eliminate the abuses and correct the mistakes and legislate intelligently, thoroughly, and honestly in the interest of veterans. [Applause.1

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself five minutes. I want to ask the gentleman from Alabama a few questions. As I understand, the contention is that the committee does not want to hold any more hearings, but simply wants more time to make its report.

Mr. McDUFFIE. That is all.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman consent to an amendment making it 30 days?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Just wait a minute. I do not want to be in error about the resolution. If the gentleman from Mississippi will go to the committee and ask to make a statement, or the gentleman from Texas, or any Member of this House wants to make a statement to the committee, the committee will be delighted to hear them. The hearings are and have been open hearings, and I do not want to be foreclosed. However, the purpose is, and the committee has so directed me to state, that this resolution is simply to get additional time to make a study of these facts, so that we can make an intelligent report to Congress.

Mr. RANKIN. In reply to the gentleman from Alabama. I desire to say that the only reason we did not go around and tell the committee what our committee knew was that it would be a futile effort. Besides, we have had all this testimony and facts before our committee for years. We had the same facilities for getting the information that his committee had, and besides we have the power to initiate legislation. If the gentleman merely wants time to make the report, I would have been willing-and other members of the committee would be willing-to grant a reasonable time. But to start hearings again and allow certain interests in this country to spread over the country wholesale and unjustified abuse of disabled veterans of the World War, I am not going to agree to it.

I submit that this resolution ought not to pass. You had just as well create a special committee to investigate the tax question and take it away from the Committee on Ways and Means as to pass this resolution. You have heard the grandstand play of the sophisticated gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Luce]. He has always tried to mislead the House on what the Veterans' Committee is doing, from a Democratic standpoint. The gentleman never asked for a hearing; if he had, he would have been given a hearing. One reason we did not go ahead and start our hearings was because the joint committee was in session. We wanted them to find out the futility of attempting to usurp the jurisdiction of a standing committee of the House, and let them know that they had delved into something that they would have to refer back to the Veterans' Committee ultimately.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I was asked to serve on this committee; I did not ask for the job. I spent a very considerable time with the committee attending hearings. The committee was most faithful. It went into this situation just as thoroughly as it was able to, and we have just about completed the hearings, and that is all. The fourth volume of the hearings is not yet printed. I do not like to see an application made for an extension of time to make a report, but frankly I must tell you the truth. It is absolutely impossible and it was absolutely impossible in the time that remained after we completed our hearings to write up and get out an intelligent report. I want to join in an intelligent report which will cover this picture thoroughly and properly present it to the Congress.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? Mr. TABER. We could not do it in the time that has been given. We have asked for a fair extension, and I hope that the Congress will see fit to grant it, so that we can present the thing thoroughly to the Congress. Of course, after that it has to go to the committee for legislation, but it will go with definite recommendations about which the Congress can expect consideration and legislation. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. As I understand the gentleman, you have completed your investigation?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. You can go ahead and writ your report; you can get unanimous consent to file that report at any time during the next Congress.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN].

WORLD WAR VETERANS AND BANKING EACKETEERS

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, the World War Veterans' Committee is the committee that should pass upon legislation of this kind. When this special committee was organized I did not see any necessity for it. Why should there be a committee to investigate the very questions that should come before the World War Veterans' Committee? I was apprehensive from the beginning-and I hope my apprehension is not well founded—that this committee was not favorable to the veterans. I know that under the leadership of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] the veterans of the United States have been given a square deal. He has not been too generous with them. He has not been extravagant with the people's money toward the veterans of the United States. In fact, this country has not been more generous toward the veterans of the World War than it has been toward the veterans and widows and orphans of other wars.

GENEROSITY OF NATION TO VETERANS

When the chairman of this joint committee [Mr. Mc-DUFFIE], a man for whom I have a very high regard, made a statement on the floor of the House at one time that this country is the most generous country on earth toward the veterans of the World War, that we are more generous than Germany or France or England or Italy, I challenged the statement at the time, and I challenge it now. Throughout the hearings before the joint committee of which the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. McDuffie] is the chairman. the idea has been impressed upon the minds of the people of the country that this country has been the most generous country on earth toward its World War veterans.

ABILITY OF NATION TO PAY

There is only one way to measure the generosity of a country toward veterans, and it is not according to the number of veterans who were disabled or injured in a certain way, or disabled by disease in a certain way, but the only way to determine the generosity of a nation is by the ability of that nation to be generous. I challenge the gentleman from Alabama, I challenge the members of that special committee, to take into consideration the ability of a nation to pay, as, for instance, Italy, France, England, and Germany, a conquered nation, and show that this country has been the most generous. They will find that our country is not spending one-fourth to one-eighth as much for our World War veterans and the widows and orphans as these other countries are spending.

That is the only way to judge the generosity of a nation. It has been brought out in this joint committee hearing that several hundred million dollars have been expended for nonservice-connected disabilities. That statement is not true and should be challenged. The Government of the United States is expending only about $107,000,000 for non-serviceconnected disabilities for veterans of the World War, and I invite attention to the fact that that money is doing more to save suffering people of this Nation to-day than any other money that is being paid out. What would this country do to-day if it were not for the money spent for veterans? These checks are going into every nook and corner of our Nation, and in some places they represent the only medium of exchange that the people have. The large income-tax payers are objecting to these payments. They want to make exorbitant profits under Government protection and keep them. Think of it! The banks of 28 States have suspended payments on checks to-day. Veterans' checks are about the only medium of exchange the country has at this time in some localities.

EMBARGO ON GOLD

May I say while I am on my feet that I think there are other serious questions confronting our country? I think this Congress should immediately put four or five billion dollars in circulation and make some arrangement to prevent the exportation of gold; that we should place an embargo on gold shipments and suspend specie payments. Our country will be helped by going off the gold standard at this time. There is also the question of whether the Government of the United States should get behind all the banking institutions of this Nation.

GET GOVERNMENT OUT OF PRIVATE BUSINESS AND GET BANKERS OUT OF GOVERNMENT BUSINESS

Mr. Speaker, banking is not a private business function. Banking is a Government function. The Government is in private business in many instances and should get out of private business. It has no right in private business, but at the same time the Government should take the bankers out of the Government's business. The Constitution of the United States provides that it is the duty of Congress to coin money and to regulate its value. That great privilege has been farmed out to a few great and powerful bankers, who have become the world's greatest racketeers. They have contracted the currency and destroyed credit. More money must be placed in circulation immediately. They are responsible for destroying our country to-day, and we are not going to bring our country back until we take that privilege away from the banking racketeers.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself two min-

Mr. Speaker, it is not a question now whether or not this committee should act. The fact is the Congress by law established this committee, outlined its duties, and ordered it to make a report. We have made the investigation. We have concluded the investigation, and we wish additional time to file the report. There is no need of going into the question of who feels kindly toward the veterans and who does not. Certainly there is nothing in the heart of a single member of that committee that would permit him to work an injustice against a single veteran of any war, and especially those veterans disabled in the service. It is a question of whether or not the House will give us a little time to make an intelligent report, and as far as I am concerned I am ready to submit it to a vote of the House.

Mr. SIROVICH. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. McDUFFIE. I yield.
Mr. SIROVICH. I wish to ask the distinguished gentleman if it is the intention of the committee to hold any further hearings?

Mr. McDUFFIE. It is not. I have stated that two or three times. It is true the resolution carries language that would permit that, but the committee, by its vote, has closed the hearings. All we ask is to let us do what you ordered us to do.

Mr. HASTINGS. When did the committee close the hearings?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Two weeks or three weeks ago.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Certainly.

Mr. RANKIN. If the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. McDuffiel will amend his resolution to limit it to a report. we will agree to it, or we will agree that you can make your report by unanimous consent in the next Congress. It will have plenty of time to go through the Senate. We are not going to leave this resolution open if I can help it, unless we get an agreement.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Well, let the House pass on it.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Connery].

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I agree with the distinguished chairman of the Veterans' Committee. The Economy Committee has had plenty of time to discuss this matter fully. They have had hearings, and I am willing for them to report to the House, but I do not believe in any further continuance of this committee or its sessions. They have had since the last session of Congress to go into the matter thoroughly. They had an opportunity to bring all their witnesses before them. If they do not know what they are going to report now, they will never know.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. That special committee has been in existence since last July, has it not?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes; and they have had plenty of opportunity to hear every witness that was necessary, and to find out all they wanted about veterans' compensation and the Veterans' Bureau and employees; and as near as I can see, almost every witness who appeared was an agent of the Economy League attempting to cut off the compensation of disabled veterans in the United States. I do not say that that was done at the request of the chairman of the committee, of course.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield. Mr. McDUFFIE. That is not quite correct. I am sure if the gentleman will take a list of the witnesses he will find that just as many witnesses appeared on the other side as appeared before the committee seeking to economize through entrenchment.

Mr. CONNERY. Well, I will say from my experience and from what I read of the hearings in the newspapers and from what I heard from the witnesses who appeared before that committee, that they were mostly from the Economy League. Of course, there were Watson Miller, of the Legion, and General Hines and the representatives of the bureau and the American Legion and the Veterans of Foreign Wars and the Disabled American Veterans, but in general the witnesses were agents of the Economy League, witnesses whose sole idea seemed to be to cut the hearts out of the disabled veterans of the country, so as to protect Mr. Rockefeller and Mr. Ford and Mr. Mellon and the rest of the multimillionaires by cutting their income taxes and saving their money for them.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Connery] has expired.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. JEFFERS].

Mr. JEFFERS. Mr. Speaker, I oppose this resolution for the reason that I feel the membership of the House should take a position at this time and assert itself as being opposed to continually taking away the powers and authority and jurisdiction of the regular standing legislative committees of the House and turning those powers over to special committees. We have a standing committee, as is well known and has been stated here.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JEFFERS. I yield.

Mr. McDUFFIE. The gentleman certainly knows that the Congress has already settled that matter. It set up this

Mr. JEFFERS. Nevertheless, objection can be made at this time, perhaps to no avail, as it should have been at the time this special committee was set up. I am objecting to the resolution now, because I think that, whereas we might have taken a bad step then, there is no use continuing it

Mr. McDUFFIE. Does the gentleman not want us to file a report?

Mr. JEFFERS. The special committee can file its report without continuing the life of the special committee.

Mr. McDUFFIE. That is what we are seeking to do here. I grant that the language of the resolution would permit additional hearings, but I will state to the gentle-

Mr. JEFFERS. I decline to yield further. I only have two minutes.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield? I will give the gentleman another minute.

Mr. JEFFERS. I yield. Mr. RANKIN. I will say to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Jeffers] that the resolution provides for a continuation of this committee with its present powers. We will not object to their filing a report. We will give them unanimous consent, but we will not consent to continuing this committee under the circumstances.

Mr. Speaker, the standing legislative Committee on Veterans' Legislation is entirely capable of handling these matters, as are all the other legislative committees of the House of Representatives.

Mr. JEFFERS. And if the House continues to give away the rights, jurisdiction, authority, and power of our regular legislative committees to these special committees we might as well abolish the legislative committees of the House of Representatives. I think all members of other legislative committees who have any feeling of pride whatsoever in their committees and in the authority, power, and jurisdiction of their committees should vote against this resolution and from now on take a stand against the continuation or creation of any more special committees.

Mr. RANKIN. I may say to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. McDuffie] that, as I have stated time and time again, we will agree that he may file his report, but we are not going to agree to continue the investigating powers of this committee for the purpose of furnishing facts to the so-called Economy League, pretending to represent an economy movement, but, in fact, representing the large taxpayers who have grown rich in the last few years, who, the testimony before the Senate committee shows, have been plundering the American people. We will not let such people continue to come here and put into the RECORD and spread through the press addresses and remarks, abuse, misrepresentation, and vilification of the disabled veterans of the World War. We will let you make this report by unanimous consent, but we are going to resume our functions as a veterans' legislative committee in the regular way.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a brief statement?

Mr. RANKIN. For a very short question.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. There has been protest against spending of money, but I regret the gentleman has said there has been any villification on the part of any member of this committee.

Mr. RANKIN. I did not say that. The gentleman misunderstood me.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Very good.

Mr. RANKIN. There has been none on the part of the committee, so far as I have heard.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER].

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, there seems to be no real difference between the gentleman from Mississippi and the gentleman from Alabama. Both are gentlemen of honor. I know the gentleman from Alabama well enough to affirm, and this House knows also that when he makes a statement that there will be no further hearing there will

On the last day of the session you can not amend pending joint resolutions of this kind without endangering their

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] has the same high esteem and regard for the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. McDuffie] that I have. He says he is willing for this committee to have an extension of time to submit its report; and he knows, and every Member of this House knows, what this committee will do and what it will not do if this extension of time is granted.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. We will agree that he may file the report by unanimous consent. There will be no objection to it.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The difficulty with that is that it must be passed on by another body.

Rest assured that if the gentleman from Alabama, the chairman of the committee, makes any promise, it will be absolutely kept. The gentleman from Mississippi knows him; I know him, and no one has a higher regard for him than my good friend and neighbor, the gentleman from Mississippi. This discussion does not, in fact, relate to any substantive difference.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Alabama may file his report at any time within 60 days after the close of this Congress.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, this is a public law. It can not be done by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. It requires a joint resolution to accomplish what is sought to be accomplished. This is a Senate joint resolution, which becomes law with the signature of the President of the United States.

The question is on the motion to suspend the rules and pass the resolution.

The question was taken; and two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the Senate joint resolution was agreed to.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for four minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, a close of any session of Congress brings sorrowful features in the breaking of ties that may have united Members over a long period of years. We all rejoice in friendship. He who has a thousand friends has none too many.

The close of the Seventy-second Congress is peculiarly illustrative of changes in that there are more men who will terminate their present congressional service than probably at any similar period within the recollection of any of our Members. The only change I recall that compares with this one happens to have been at the beginning of my own career here, namely, at the close of the Sixty-second and the opening of the Sixty-third Congress. It is also an outstanding fact that many men of prominence, holders of the most influential positions in Congress, will say their farewells to-morrow. I need not endeavor to name these men, but wish to make very brief remarks about one in particular.

For 20 years we have been colleagues, for 16 years serving on the same committee. While we sat on opposite sides of the political aisle, and while the Ways and Means Committee is regarded as the partisan committee of Congress, our views have run in similar channels and many times we have found ourselves voting together.

Some of us have impulsive dispositions; some most genial. It takes all kinds to make a composite body like this, but if I were to select from the entire membership of this House one man who is the most cordial, whose manners are the most courteous, my immediate thoughts would be centered on the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Coller].

The one place to learn of a man is to sit around a committee table with him for days, weeks, and months, particularly in the hot atmosphere of a Washington summer. So I feel I know intimately the retiring chairman of the Ways and Means Committee and will treasure his friendship always. Genial, courteous, considerate of others, irrespective of party, a thorough gentleman.

To have completed 24 years of service to the people of his district, State, and Nation is an encomium enough for any man. I venture to say that such a length of service would be impossible if it were not coupled with the respect and regard of his colleagues, characteristics that have endeared him to our membership here.

My own associations with him have not been limited to the committee room or to the floor of the House. We have the ties of fraternity and the memory of having enjoyed attendance together at the great American pastime of baseball. His service as a member and as chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, his ability as a debater, are well-known to us all. No man has carried on debates on this floor with a higher degree of intelligence nor with a more pleasant smile toward his opponents than has the gentleman from Mississippi. It is not for us to question or ask for explanations from the constituents of any man, but I think that my colleagues on the committee and in this House will agree with me that the failure to return Mr. Collier is a distinct loss to the country.

It is a trite saying that we wish our colleagues success, health, and prosperity in the future, but to no man of those retiring to-morrow from public life can this remark be more sincerely made than to the gentleman from Mississippi, James W. Collier. [Applause.]

Mr. PARKER of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. PARKER of New York. Mr. Speaker, the Republican delegation from the State of New York is to lose six of its distinguished Members in the next Congress, and it seems fitting that a slight tribute should be paid to their services during their terms in office.

The Hon. Archie D. Sanders has served eight consecutive terms in Congress, and is retiring voluntarily, not having been a candidate for renomination.

In Republican politics in New York State the name of Archie D. Sanders is known from one end of the State to the other. He has been very active in public affairs during his whole career. He served in both branches of the legislature, he was collector of internal revenue, and during his term of office in Congress he has been chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. Everyone who knows Mr. Sanders can readily understand why his political career has been of such long duration. The pleasant smile, the gracious manner, coupled with an extraordinary amount of good horse sense, has endeared him to the people of his district and his State.

Mr. Sanders will be missed as much as anyone I know of, for his philosophy of life was always refreshing and encouraging. [Applause.]

The Hon. Fighelio H. LaGuardia has served seven terms in Congress. On a great many occasions I have disagreed with Mr. LaGuardia on his philosophy of government, but I have the highest admiration for his ability, integrity, and honesty. I think the House will unite in paying tribute to Mr. LaGuardia as one of the most useful Members of Congress. He has had wide experience during his life; he has been in the public service 28 years, starting as a consul in a small diplomatic post. He was elected to the Sixty-fifth Congress, and immediately upon the outbreak of the war Mr. LaGuardia was one of the first men in Congress to volunteer. He volunteered as an aviator, and rendered distinguished service overseas in the combat unit. He was the commander of the American division on the Italian and Hungarian front and received a decoration from the Italian Government for his distinguished service. Immediately after his discharge from the Army he was reelected to Congress. He was afterwards elected president of the board of aldermen in the great city of New York, and was the only Republican to have been elected in a generation in a citywide election. In 1929 he was Republican candidate for mayor. He was elected to the Sixty-eighth Congress, and has been here since that time. While, as I have said, I have disagreed with Mr. LaGuardia on a great many different occasions, I think it is a fair statement to say that no Member will be more sincerely missed from the floor of the House than Mr. LaGuardia. [Applause.]

Hon. HARCOURT J. PRATT, of the twenty-seventh district of the State of New York, has been here with us for four consecutive terms and is leaving voluntarily. He was not a candidate for renomination.

Mr. Pratt during his service has been most attentive to his congressional duties and has been a most useful Member of Congress. He has been very active on the great Agriculture Committee. Naturally modest and somewhat retiring, Mr. Pratt is respected and has the devoted admiration of the Members who have come in contact with him.

His activities have not been on the floor but have been in the committee and, as I have said before, he has been most diligent to his duties on that committee. Mr. Pratt has a most genial disposition, and his departure from Congress will be a great loss both to the State of New York and to the district which he has had the honor to represent.

Hon. Frederick M. Davenport, who represents the thirty-third district of New York, is a very decided loss to the Congress of the United States. He has been here four consecutive terms.

Mr. Davenport has had long experience in the Senate of the State of New York and is a student of governmental affairs, as he is well known by the membership of the House, who well remember the very able addresses he has made before this body.

I am sure that it is with extreme regret that the House, irrespective of party, will sincerely regret the departure of Congressman Davenport from the membership of Congress.

Congresswoman Ruth Baker Pratt, of the seventeenth district of New York, has served two consecutive terms in Congress with great distinction, having come here from the turmoil of the board of aldermen in New York City, where she served as the first woman to be a member of that body which governs the greatest city in the world.

Mrs. Pratt's service in Congress needs no eulogy from me. Everyone knows that she has given her best in the interest of her country and her party, and it is the sincere hope of her friends that she will be returned to Congress in the near future.

Hon. EDMUND F. COOKE has served two terms in Congress from the forty-first district of New York, which is part of the great city of Buffalo.

His political career extends over many years, as he was a very prominent member of the Legislature in New York State before coming to Washington, and it is hoped by the Members on our side that his pleasant smile and pleasing personality will again be seen as a Member of this body.

On behalf of the New York delegation I wish to assure the retiring Members that they have our most sincere regards and best wishes for the future.

Mr. Speaker, I want to say a word about the departing members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. For a good many years, as the older Members of the House know, I had the honor of being chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. I think you will all agree with me that the personnel of that committee, chosen from both sides of the House, has not been exceeded by the personnel of any committee. We had, I think, as fine a representation on the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce from the Republican side as had any committee that was ever organized in the House of Representatives.

The departing members are going to be missed tremendously. I am sorry the gentleman from Texas, the present distinguished chairman of this committee, is not present, because I know he would bear witness to what I am going to say, but the gentlemen who are going out will leave a void in that committee which it will be extremely hard to fill from either side of the House. Take, for instance, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. Hoch]. He was one of the most diligent members of the committee, a man whose interrogation of a witness was always intelligent and always to the point, and I may add that any witness, who came before that committee not knowing his subject, wished that he had not appeared.

Then there is Mr. WYANT, of Pennsylvania, a most useful member of the committee; Mr. Burtness of North Dakota, a most useful member of the committee, always on the job, and who did a tremendous amount of work and did favors for practically every Member in the House in his work as a member of the subcommittee on bridges. There is also the gentleman from Maine, Mr. NELSON, one of the ablest men we have in the present House, who was always attentive and a most efficient member of the committee. Mr. Robinson, of Iowa; was a most faithful and intelligent member of the committee, always in attendance, and whose keen judgment was a great help to the committee; and Judge GARBER, of Oklahoma, whose interrogations were of the greatest value.

I wish to reiterate that whenever any witness came before this committee and went through the cross-examinations that they were subjected to by the members of the committee, in a perfectly orderly way, because no witness was ever abused before the committee, we knew perfectly well when they got through whether they understood their subject or not; and to these retiring gentlemen I wish to pay my most sincere respects and give them my most sincere thanks for the support they have given to me and to Mr. RAYBURN. [Applause.]

GENERAL PERMISSION TO EXTEND REMARKS

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members of the Seventy-second Congress may have five days after the adjournment of the Congress in which to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

REMONETIZATION OF SILVER

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a short speech made by the Member elect from Idaho, Mr. Compton I.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, under the unanimous consent given me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I desire to insert an address by Hon. Compton I. White, a Member elect of Congress from the State of Idaho, outlining his views on the silver question. Mr. White has given this subject a great deal of study, and I am sure that the Members will find his address both interesting and instructive. especially in the light of our present distressful situation.

The address is as follows:

As the futility of the experiment of our National Government in attempting to refinance business and restore commodity prices in the United States through the operation of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation becomes apparent, sentiment in this country will crystallize in favor of revising our obsolete monetary system.

When general recognition is given the fact that prices of commodities are ruled by and fluctuate with the price of silver and that there is an imperative need for more real money as a base for our credit structure, the pressure of public opinion that will be exerted on Congress will force the enactment of constructive financial legislation financial legislation.

PAPER INADEQUATE

In doing this Congress must of necessity recognize and bring about the rehabilitation of silver which will have a constructive tendency world-wide in effect.

Issues of paper money based on credit measures at best can only affect internal conditions and domestic markets and benefits only affect internal conditions and deflects harkers and beliefs to be derived from such measures will not affect foreign markets for our surplus products which always have been and will continue to be ruled by the prices fixed by the silver-using countries. What must be done is to assist in restoring foreign markets as an outlet for our surplus products. The rehabilitation of silver is the only thing that will do this.

It is apparent that, due to the swing in public sentiment now setting in, the next Congress will enact the Pittman bill to purchase American-produced silver at the market price of such silver, paying for the metal with legal tender silver certificates redeemable in silver dollars to be coined from the silver so purchased, leaving the surplus silver metal as an additional reserve to back the circulating certificates.

As a financial measure, this legislation should meet the approval of the most conservative financiers, and under any circumstances will be beneficial to the country as a whole. It will put new money in circulation, purchasing power itself minus interest and at the same time the seignlorage will be a source of profit to the Government, and as silver is almost certain to advance under the operation of the act, the Government stands to realize a substantial profit from that end of the transaction, to say nothing of the revenue to be derived from income-tax returns accruing from the profits of the silver producers and other income-tax returns the profits of the silver producers and other income-tax returns resulting from the stimulation in other lines of business cumulative in effect-restoration of confidence.

PARALLEL TRACED

When we review the close relation existing between the average of commodity prices and the price of silver extending back as far of commodity prices and the price of silver extending back as far as records have been kept and compare the quantitative production and the percentage of valuation of silver, wheat, and other commodities, we find that the annual world production of wheat in 1929 was 4,169,000,000 bushels valued at $2,500,000 and the value of the annual production of cotton, sugar, copper, rubber, silk, and coffee of the same year totaled $3,386,000,000, while the annual world's production of silver, at peak, in 1929, was 361,715,000 ounces valued at $73,300,000, or only 2.93 per cent of the total value of wheat or less than 1.25 per cent of the combined value of the annual production of wheat and the six commodities mentioned. When we consider 1¼ per cent silver controls the price of the other 98¾ per cent commodities, it is apparent that the governments of the world should take concerted action to enhance and stabilize the value of silver as a means of restoring comstabilize the value of silver as a means of restoring commodity prices.

MUST TURN BACK

If the governments of the world are soon to repair the damage sustained by the collapse of their finances and the despoliation of their credit structures and the derangement of their monetary systems, they must then turn back and adopt some plan similar to the one that underlaid the monetary convention of December 23, 1865, subscribed to by France, Belgium, Italy, and Switzerland, when they united in a monetary treaty known as the "Latin Union," "to regulate the weight, title, form, and circulation of their gold and silver coins with unlimited coinage and legal tender for such coins."

If the money units of the leading nations could be standardized under some form of bimetalism, many of the barriers to international trade in the form of inequalities of exchange, now a source of profit to international bankers, would be removed.

Tariff barriers are largely a manifestation of the penury of the money medium and are accentuated in times of universal money

The return to bimetalism by the leading nations of the world and the standardization of their monetary units would be a most important step in advancing the welfare of the whole human family in general and the United States in particular.

ST. LAWRENCE TREATY

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Mr. Speaker, the St. Lawrence treaty, in its present form, will insure a seagoing canal down the St. Lawrence through Canada to the Atlantic, thus providing for Canada and the Great Lakes area low-cost water transportation.

The ratification of this treaty in its present form, however, makes it impossible for the heart of the agricultural section of the Central West to participate in the benefits so generously given the Lake States and the Dominion of Canada. The only connection possible between the magnificent inland waterway system and the Great Lakes is through the Illinois and Chicago Rivers to Lake Michigan at Chicago. The only thing that makes this connecting link possible is a diversion of water from Lake Michigan into the Chicago River of about 5,000 second-feet. The St. Lawrence treaty limits this diversion for all time to come to 1,500 second-feet and forever handicaps the farmers of southern Illinois, Missouri, Iowa, Nebraska, and Kansas to the benefit of a foreign nation.

Fort William, on the north shore of Lake Superior, is the largest wheat port in the world, with the existing 14-foot waterway in the Lakes and down the St. Lawrence. Canadian wheat, through this port, is able to go direct to Liverpool at a low-cost water rate. The proposed 27-foot channel from this port out to the sea makes it possible to carry Canadian wheat direct to the world market at a much lower cost than now prevails, while a ratification of this treaty denies these benefits to the great agricultural section represented by the States noted above.

The industrial area of New York and New Jersey provides the largest domestic market for farm products in the country. To improve the Lakes-St. Lawrence waterway and destroy the connection between the great inland waterway system and the Great Lakes gives the farm products of the Lake States a monopoly by giving them low-cost water rates from the Lakes through the New York Barge Canal and down the Hudson River, while it prevents the use of this waterway for the transportation of the farm products of southern Illinois, Missouri, Iowa, Nebraska, Kansas, Oklahoma, Arkansas, and adjacent country.

The persistent attempt has been made by the advocates of the St. Lawrence treaty to make the country believe that the Supreme Court has adjudicated the diversion of water at Chicago. This is untrue, unfair, and misleading. As a matter of fact, the Supreme Court refused to consider navigation in connection with a Lakes-to-the-Gulf waterway, because a Lakes-to-the-Gulf project had not been approved by Congress at that time. The Supreme Court decision was rendered in April, 1930, and the project was not adopted until July, 1930. The Supreme Court instructed Special Master Hughes to consider the amount of diversion necessary to keep the Chicago River sufficiently sanitary for navigation but gave no consideration to the needs of a Lakes-to-the-Gulf waterway.

Special Master Hughes in taking the testimony in this case considered the Chicago River as the port of Chicago and as an arm of Lake Michigan in connection with lake navigation only and did not consider at all the fact that water was needed for the Illinois waterway because at that time there was no authorized Federal project between Damon Avenue on the Chicago River and Utica on the Illinois River.

Since that time, the rivers and harbors act of July, 1930, connected up the project in the Chicago River with the project in the Illinois River; and if this case were being tried now, consideration would have to be given to the needs of the Illinois waterway.

The rivers and harbors bill of 1930, adopting a Lakes-tothe-Gulf waterway, provided that after the project is completed and in operation, the engineers of the War Department under the direction of the Secretary shall have until 1938 to make tests and determine the amount of diversion necessary to make a commercially successful Lakes-to-the-Gulf waterway. The treaty, if ratified by the Senate, will absolutely nullify that provision of the rivers and harbors act which was passed by the Congress and signed by the President. The people of the Mississippi Valley whose future depends upon a successful Lakes-to-the-Gulf waterway supported this legislation in good faith, never suspecting the State Department and the Senate would undertake by a treaty with Canada to nullify this solemn act of Congress. We most strenuously protest against the ratification of the St. Lawrence treaty, containing the provisions of article 8 which not only nullifies this solemn act of Congress but takes away from Congress for all time the right to regulate diversion out of this purely American lake and to take water which comes exclusively out of the American watershed for use in an all-American waterway.

Hydraulic engineers generally agree that a sufficient diversion to insure a successful Lakes-to-the-Gulf waterway would mean a difference in lake levels not more than 3 inches. The rivers and harbors act of 1930, approving the Lakes-to-the-Gulf waterway provides that compensating works should be installed in the Lakes at the expense of the United States which will raise the levels of the Lakes approximately 12 inches. These works will cost about $3,600,-000, which is a comparatively small sum in comparison with the cost of other improvements on the Great Lakes. Just think, for this small amount of money the levels of the Lakes can be restored and the basis of claim for damage made by the Lake States for so many years can be removed. This has been known for years, but the statement has always been made that Canada would not approve such works and there was only one reason for this-Canada wanted to reserve this question affecting lake levels as a trading point so that when it came to the negotiation of a treaty Canada could get what she wanted. Apparently Canada used this in the treaty negotiations, because every point wanted by Canada was granted.

A diversion of 10,000 feet will lower levels in Montreal Harbor 41/2 inches. The water levels in Montreal Harbor fluctuate at least 10 feet in the average season, and a lowering of 41/2 inches is not worth considering when such a wide range of fluctuation must be taken care of anyhow. So it will be observed that if we take care of lake levels by increasing them 12 inches above the levels which nature provided, we insure a 27-foot waterway down the St. Lawrence. We have tremendously improved navigation on the Great Lakes and down the St. Lawrence, and this is so after diversion sufficient to make a great all-American waterway. Navigation is not involved in this controversy except that it will be improved. The only thing involved in a diversion sufficient for a commercially successful all-American waterway is this: The water used to insure this waterway can not be used to turn the turbines of the power companies down the St. Lawrence, and I can not see why any American ought not to be more interested in a great American waterway not only for the present needs of the country but for the needs of the future, than he is in Canadian power.

The British diplomats in the negotiation of this treaty, as usual, succeeded in getting the lion's share. The treaty proposes to build a St. Lawrence waterway which the report of the treaty commission estimates will cost the United States $243,000,000 and the Canadian Government $39,000,000. As a matter of fact, great hydraulic engineers have estimated that this St. Lawrence improvement will cost all the way from $800,000,000 to $1,300,000,000. It is my recollection that Col. Hugh Cooper, who built the Keokuk Dam, who supervised the engineering of the power dam at Muscle Shoals, who has just finished the great power dams of Russia, estimated that the cost of the St. Lawrence waterway firm conviction that time will show that the amount estimated by the treaty commission will not nearly do the work necessary to complete this Canadian waterway. After we are involved in the treaty, however, and the $340,000,000 provided has been expended, they will then come back to us for hundreds of millions more in order to complete the project.

improvement would amount to $1,300,000,000, and I have a

As a result of this treaty, 5,000,000 horsepower of electricity will be created in the St. Lawrence; and while we provide the expense of the improvement, the United States will get 1,000,000 horsepower of this electricity, and the Canadians will get 4,000,000 horsepower.

Another evidence of the unfairness of this treaty is the fact that Canada is allowed to divert 36,000 second-feet of water at Niagara Falls for power purposes and 5,000 second-feet for the Welland Canal, making a total of 41,000 second-feet, while the Americans are only allowed to divert 22,000 second-feet.

For a hundred years the United States has persistently and continually maintained sovereignty over Lake Michigan as an all-American lake. In 1910 the Canadians insisted upon writing a limit of 10,000 second-feet upon the diversion at Chicago. Elihu Root, supported by the United States Senate, persistently refused to allow the Caradians to assert | Barge Canal and the Hudson River will result in the growth any authority over Lake Michigan. This treaty purposes to give the Canadian Government absolute control over any diversion out of Lake Michigan beyond 1,500 second-feet. Another evidence of the unfairness of this treaty is the fact that Canada has full authority to construct a canal from Georgian Bay, which is a tributary of the Great Lakes, through Canadian territory to Lake Ontario and to take all the water which they deem necessary to make all such Canadian Canal a commercial success, and this without the consent of the United States, while the treaty gives Canada the absolute control over the diversion for an all-American waterway out of an all-American lake, and by using water which comes entirely from the American watershed.

The regulation of the Panama Canal from the standpoint of national defense and from the standpoint of low-cost transportation was a great achievement. It has been a great blessing to the eastern and western seaports of the country, but commercially it has been the greatest handicap that was ever imposed upon the middle-western section. It has made it impossible for industry in the Upper Mississippi Valley to compete with the industries from Canada, Europe, and other ports of the world. The only way by which this handicap can be overcome is by a successful all-American waterway from the Lakes to the Gulf with the improvement of the tributaries of the Mississippi system. We have a wonderfully successful Great Lakes system which is connected by the New York Barge Line in the Hudson with the great industrial area in New York. It is connected with the outside world through the St. Lawrence route. Congress has labored for years and expended much money in an effort to improve the great interior waterway system. To ratify this treaty and make it impossible to connect those two great systems will do an injury to the interior of this country which no one at this time can calculate.

Our industries in the Middle West are leaving us because of the lack of low-cost water transportation. They are settling around the seashore and along the lake shore where low-cost water transportation prevails. The Middle West is the bread basket of the United States, and the rest of the country ought to be willing to give our great midwestern section the same facilities and opportunities for development that the seashore sections enjoy.

Those States in the upper Mississippi Valley have lost 17 seats in Congress because industries have been forced to move to where they could get the benefits of low-cost water transportation for the distribution of their products, and population follows industry. You can move your factories to the seashore, but you can not move your farm; you can not move your buildings in your cities, towns, and municipalities, and the only way you can develop the great resources of the interior of this country and make it possible for them, through the revenues which they pay in the Federal Treasury to bear their share of the tax burden, is by the development of low-cost water transportation which will permit the development of industry in the midst of agriculture.

We have in such Southern States as Texas, Oklahoma, Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, Arkansas, Tennessee, Kentucky, West Virginia, Georgia, and Florida rich agricultural areas which need the development of industry. The development of these States depends upon high-class ocean service out of the Gulf and South Atlantic ports. In order to develop high-class dependable ocean service a balanced cargo consisting of heavy bottom freight and high top freight is necessary. The Southern States have an abundance of heavy cargo. The heavy high-class top freight must be brought from the industrial centers which should develop in the upper-valley States and will develop if dependable service is provided in the Southern States. Nothing will do more to develop the southern ports and insure dependable ocean service out of these ports than a successful Lakes-tothe-Gulf waterway with the development of the entire Mississippi system.

Furthermore, the development of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence system with the improvement of the New York of a tremendous industrial area around the Lakes. This will furnish a valuable market for the products of the South, and yet the only way which the products of the South can reach this market will be by the use of a successful waterway from the Southern States into the Great Lakes. If this treaty is adopted in its present form, this great industrial center which provides a valuable home market for American products will be absolutely shut off from the Southern States. It will also provide a water transportation from all Canadian points to the Gulf of Mexico.

Mr. Speaker, this treaty with article 8 should not be ratified. It is unfair; it is unjust; it imposes a cost of hundreds of millions of dollars on the people of the United States at a time when they are overtaxed; it imposes a heavy tax burden on the people of the Middle West and the South for a project which they can not utilize without a successful Lakes-to-the-Gulf waterway, and, worst of all, it makes it necessary for the United States to pour hundreds of millions of dollars into the construction of a waterway through a foreign country mainly for the creation of power which will be owned and controlled by the foreign-power interests. The treaty in its present form should be rejected, and our American diplomats in future negotiations should see to it that when a treaty is written that American interests are protected and that justice is done to our own country.

At the recent annual meeting of the National Rivers and Harbors Association I was appointed chairman of a committee for the consideration of the St. Lawrence treaty as it affects the interest and welfare of the United States as a whole nation. The statement I have just read was submitted to the committee of which I am chairman and has been indorsed by them as follows: "We have read with approval the statement you have prepared for presentation to the Congress on the St. Lawrence waterway treaty and heartily indorse the views you have set forth in this argument. (Signed) John H. Kelly, Sioux City, Iowa; B. L. Mallory, Memphis, Tenn.; C. F. Richardson, Louisville, Ky.

HON. BURTON L. FRENCH

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Speaker, on March 4, 1933, 30 years will have elapsed since a young man, but little more than 27 years of age, came out of the West and took his seat as a Member of the National House of Representatives.

Of the 30 years that have intervened, with great credit to his State, to the Nation, and to himself, he has been a Member of this body 26 years. I refer to the distinguished gentleman from Idaho, the Hon. Burton L. French. [Applause.]

Though still in the prime of life, but three Members of this Congress took their seats in this body earlier than did the gentleman from Idaho-they are Mr. Haugen, of Iowa; Mr. Pou, of North Carolina; and Mr. Shallenberger, of Nebraska.

Our illustrious Speaker, our distinguished floor leader, and the ever-watchful, indefatigable gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. Stafford, are the only ones of our present Membership who began their national legislative careers simultaneously with Mr. FRENCH.

On the 4th of March, but a few days off, Mr. French will return to his home in Idaho; not in defeat, except in a political sense. He will carry with him the laurels of loyal friendships, deep respect, and great admiration that he has won of every Member of this body, regardless of party.

Mr. French has builded for himself here a most enviable reputation. In all my experience here or elsewhere I have never contacted a man more fair, more unselfish, more attentive to his legislative duties, or more ready to be of help and assistance to his colleagues. It has been my privilege to serve with him for 10 years on the naval subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations. I know how diligently and conscientiously he undertakes a responsibility. To-day he stands beyond question one of the best informed men in this Chamber upon our Naval Establishment, and I know of no Member more conversant than he with the problems of the great western country from which he comes.

He goes from here with the respect and admiration of us all, and I am sure you all join me in expressing the hope and the wish that the future may have in store for him blessings without end. [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by including in the Record a letter from Matthew Wold, vice president of the American Federation of Labor, to Bainbridge Colby, former Secretary of State, and the return letter.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

WILLIAM H. HOLMES

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 465) for the relief of William H. Holmes, with a House amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Stafford].

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, when this bill was under consideration on night before last under call of the Consent Calendar, I offered an amendment to the Senate bill.

I have since considered the bill very carefully and believe that the amendment I offered would do violence to the real purpose of the bill. I ask unanimous consent to vacate the proceedings whereby the House adopted the amendment and let the House agree to the Senate bill without the House amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves that the House recede from its amendment to the Senate bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DARROW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. DARROW. Mr. Speaker, with the final adjournment of Congress there is always a tinge of sadness, for in parting we will be saying good-by to many good friends and colleagues who are retiring from the public service, most of them, I would say, involuntarily and probably only temporarily

Speaking for the State of Pennsylvania, I feel that from our delegation this House is losing the services of men who have proved themselves most valuable Members, experienced legislators, and efficient public servants, whose places it will be difficult to fill.

I would particularly mention of the dean of our delegation, Doctor Temple, with 20 years' service to his credit, a former chairman of the important Committee on Foreign Affairs, one beloved and respected by all and whose counsel and advice will be sorely missed.

Then I would mention such veterans as Milton W. Shreve, Guy E. Campbell, and Adam M. Wyant, who have rendered such distinctive service.

While their length of service was shorter, we will miss as much such men as Benjamin M. Golder, Frederick W. Magrady, William R. Coyle, Harry A. Estep, J. Mitchell Chase, Patrick J. Sullivan, Norton L. Lichtenwalner, Howard W. Stull, Edmund F. Erk, Robert L. Davis, and Joseph F. Biddle.

I am certain I am expressing the sentiment not only of our delegation but of the whole House in voicing our regret at their departure and expressing to them our hearty good wishes for the future. [Applause.]

Mr. SWICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? There was no objection.

Mr. SWICK. Mr. Speaker, it has been my privilege to serve on the Pension Committee for the past six years. On that committee is a man whose sterling worth we will very much miss when he leaves this House to-morrow. As the chairman of the committee for a time and during the past two years the ranking minority member, he has exerted an influence equal to if not greater than any member of the committee. His insistance for a square deal to the ex-service man and at the same time his honesty and faithfulness to the Government of which he was a part made him a most valuable legislator. We wish for Mr. W. F. Kopp, who is completing 12 years of splendid service, the best of health, happiness, and success when he returns to his native State, "out where the tall corn grows." [Applause.]

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, we listened a few minutes ago to the remarks of the gentleman who is now occupying the chair [Mr. Woodrum], and I will say that he spoke the sentiments of the whole House when he referred to the position in which we frequently find ourselves described by the press. Congress was also defended ably by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Davenport] at the memorial services. These colleagues know of sacrifices and conscientious labors that are a part of the duties of practically every Member, not understood or appreciated by thoughtless news writers.

It is unfortunate that people who represent all the various States in this great body do not get credit which they deserve for hard work, for honest service, and for ability second to none of the Representatives of this Government with whom I have been privileged to serve during the past 20 years in this great body. I wish to say this in regard to the gentlemen who come from my own State, and I only need to mention them by name that the House will recognize the value of their services.

I do not know how long the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Stafford] has served in the American Congress, as far back as 1903, or 30 years ago. He is as vigorous and constant in attendance in the House as on the day of his first arrival. When I asked him a moment ago the length of service in this, the finest parliamentary body in the world, he answered, "10 terms," but I believe he is forgetful, unusual with one who is known to every Member of the House, and unless vacations have been more frequent than indicated by his appetite for work, I believe it is much longer than that. No one in the House has been more active as a parliamentarian or watchful of legislation on the floor of the House for the protection of the Government Treasury than my Wisconsin colleague. [Applause].

For a quarter of a century another colleague, Representative John Nelson, has been prominent in conducting the legislation of this House. On many committees, sometimes as chairman, his good work is familiar to those of us who know his worth as a Member. He was a valued citizen and prominent in his home State long before he came here. I will say for him that which can not be always said by those engaged in lawmaking that I believe every Member of this House has a kindly regard and feeling of friendship for Congressman Nelson. I do not say good-by to these colleagues, because the scene of past victories may lure them back to the House.

Another gentleman from Milwaukee came among us several terms ago, and for a while contentedly took an unimportant part, but during the last session, I believe, he has grown 100 per cent in legislative ability—as I have heard Members state—my good friend, Congressman Schafer, who is leaving us, but may return to his former duties, and if so, be welcomed by his colleagues. [Applause.]

Congressman Schneider, also from my State, has been an outstanding representative of labor and active on many committees of the House, including the Post Office Committee, during many years.

I want to say that the flood of votes came very hard and unexpectedly to some of my colleagues, who believed that a good record for accomplishments was fully understood by constituents.

The flood will recede as in the past. We have always found it so, and I have observed the departure of men temporarily overtaken by these cyclones and then their equally sudden return when the home people discovered their loss. I have watched the ebb and flow of the tide in politics. Only 135 Republicans sat here in 1913, but in 1922 the number of the faithful on this side of the aisle had increased to 299, while 131 Democrats carried the banner in the Sixty-seventh Congress. We are coming back. The tide will again turn and other good men, not Republicans, may find temporary vacations, as Uncle Joe Cannon used to term such retirements.

Congressman Schneider, from my State, is one of the leading labor Representatives in the House, and has had the respect, I know, of the entire membership of this House. The same is true of Representative Kading, who leaves you at this time; an able lawyer, a member of the Merchant Marine, Radio, and Fisheries Committee, a strong man.

Our State unexpectedly failed to keep up its average increase in population. We lost the eleventh Member by an eyelash and the State legislature was compelled to throw two good men together. That is the fate of an unkind census.

So, too, of Tom Amle, one of the latest of the progressive Republican recruits to come from Wisconsin; a bright, able man. Had he been here longer he would have made his mark more indelibly, but he is young yet. Some of these gentlemen I am sure are coming back and will be with you later on.

It is hard to make proper recognition of such men in these brief remarks. Their records are known only to their colleagues. All work hard, harder than is appreciated by these gentlemen in the press gallery, who so frequently and unfairly criticize the House for sins of omission and commission. That is their mistake, because most of the legislative work is done in the committees. I have been here long enough to appreciate that work, and have learned that every Member, who represents nearly 300,000 people on the average, must have some qualities that fit him for public service. We soon learn to know them. The press often jumps at conclusions. Sensationalism frequently occupies the front page; and it is easier to attract the public eye with clever thrusts than to tell the truth, which would not be read. During my service I have learned to know of the splendid work that is done in the committees as well as on the floor of the House. Day after day the hearings are had on which legislation must be based, and I believe the country will eventually learn to appreciate it. If not, it is one of the unfortunate results of not dividing the press gallery so that a portion might see the other side of the picture.

I listened to remarks the other day from the gentleman from New York [Mr. Snell], leader on the Republican side, and I also listened to-day to the remarks of my good friend from Virginia [Mr. Woodrum]. The latter spoke of what you gentlemen will do on the Democratic side in putting forward legislation. You will not need advice from across the aisle. Let me remind you that the leader on the Republican side has said we would join hands with you in all that will bring back prosperity to the people. He represents the sentiment on our side of every Member so far as legislation toward relief is concerned, and you will need the prayers of the politically righteous as well as your own efforts before we can lift this country out of the present depression. We are going to work together for that result; we are all patriotic before partisanship. [Applause.]

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, many Members of the present Congress will not be Members of the Seventy-third Congress, but all will remain Americans.

This is no time for furloughs from service to our country. This is the most important hour in our national existence. There are more complex and important national problems confronting us than ever before.

Once to every man and nation Comes the moment to decide In the strife of truth with falsehood For the good or evil side.

The moment to decide is here. May the decision be made in behalf of truth and justice and in behalf of the people of our Nation. May God help those in Congress and out to decide in behalf of the fathers and mothers who love their children as you and I love our children. May God help us to decide in favor of the children who love their fathers and mothers as you loved yours and as I loved my father and mother. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I dare say no committee in the House has suffered so great a loss in membership in the next Congress as has the great and powerful Committee on Appropriations, of which I have had the honor to be chairman for the last two years, but upon which I shall not serve during the next Congress, owing to the generosity of my Democratic friends who nominated me in the caucus yesterday for another position. There will be 14 vacancies on that committee, and with my own, 15. The committee consists of 35 members. Two of the vacancies are Democrats, one the Hon. William C. Wright, of Georgia, who is retiring voluntarily, and of whose worth and standing and ability it is not necessary for me to speak. He has made a faithful, earnest, patriotic, loyal, and capable Member of Congress, and we lose him with regret.

The other Democrat is the Hon. Lewis Douglas, who retires from Congress to assume the very important duties of Director of the Budget, and may I say from my connection with the Committee on Appropriations ever since the Budget was first established, in my judgment there is no more important position in the Government under the President than that of the Director of the Budget. It is a position which requires not only careful study and earnest work, but it requires ability and the courage of one's convictions. Mr. Douglas possesses those qualifications in a very high degree.

The Republicans who will retire from the committee are Hon. WILLIAM R. WOOD, from Indiana; Hon. Edward H. Wason, from New Hampshire; Hon. Burton L. French, from Idaho; Hon. MILTON W. SHREVE, from Pennsylvania; Hon. Frank Murphy, from Ohio; Hon. John W. Summers, from Washington; Hon. Henry E. Barbour, from California; Hon. Guy U. Hardy, from Colorado; Hon. Maurice H. Thatcher, from Kentucky; Hon. Frank Clague, from Minnesota; Hon. Robert G. Simmons, from Nebraska; and Hon. William P. Holaday, from Illinois.

It is impossible for me, in a few moments, to discuss the records of these gentlemen one by one. All of them have served with distinction and credit to themselves and their States. I have had occasion heretofore to express my appreciation of the cooperation which I and other members of the committee have received from every one of those gentlemen who have been in the minority for the past two years. I have had occasion to commend not only their ability, not only their earnest desire for economy, but their nonpartisanship in the consideration of appropriations pending before that committee.

I served under Hon. WILLIAM R. Wood, whom I succeeded as chairman. I endeavored to give him all of the cordial support and cooperation in my power; and I want to say I have had it returned in fullest measure by that distinguished Indianan. I have simply risen to say that these gentlemen have rendered distinguished service in this House. No one will ever know how much they and their colleagues upon the committee have saved the Treasury of the United States in dollars in the course of their deliberations. I wish for of the committee; Hon. Frank Bohn, of Michigan; Hon. each of them a long life and a happy and prosperous future.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. I yield. Mr. SNELL. I noticed in the gentleman's remarks he made special reference to the appointment of Mr. Lewis Douglas as Director of the Budget. I wish to say I think that is probably one of the outstanding appointments that any President could make at this time. Mr. Douglas is a young man. He is especially well qualified for the work that the director should do. He has youth, ability, and a desire to work. I prophesy he will make a great record in that position. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS. I agree with the gentleman. I have had occasion to say heretofore that I do not believe the President could have found a man throughout the country who would have made a more satisfactory Director of the Budget than Mr. Douglas. He is peculiarly qualified for the position. He has youth and vigor, to which the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] has referred; he has ability, and then he has the courage which is necessary to make a success in that great and important office.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I want to express my thanks to these retiring Members for their cordial cooperation with me as chairman for the past two years. They have made it possible for this committee to make a great record, in my humble judgment, in the matter of reduction in appropriations. I am under great obligation to those gentlemen for the advice and suggestions which each of them has made to me from time to time with reference to the work in hand. I repeat, I wish them all a long life, full of prosperity and happiness, to which they are all entitled. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, as chairman of the House Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, I very willingly take the floor at this time to carry on the splendid custom of paying tribute to those Members who will be absent in the next Congress.

The House Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads loses very heavily in that seven of its valuable members will not be with us in the Seventy-third Congress.

The work of this committee is such that it does not always attract the RECORD, and its deliberations can not be found among the headlines of the press, but the members of this committee, the board of directors of the largest business institution in the world, perform their arduous duties in a highly efficient manner. [Applause.]

The members of our committee also consider and pass upon the policy of the largest and most stable banking organization in this country, the Postal Savings System; but, as I said a moment ago, the consideration of postal matters are such as do not always grip the public mind and attention as do the efforts of some other committees of the House, but these men, our colleagues who have served with us for a number of years, are esteemed and appreciated by the members of the committee who will carry on in the next House.

Just a few days ago our committee adopted resolutions which have since been signed and transmitted to these members, setting forth our estimate of their ability and service, and the high regard in which we hold each of Yesterday a luncheon was given to the Members who will no longer be associated with us in the work of our committee. I mention these things to you because, in my judgment, it is far better to tell our friends what we think of them while they are here than to do so after they are gone. [Applause.]

The men on our committee whose services we will lose include the Hon. La Fayette Patterson, of Alabama; Hon. ARCHIE SANDERS, of New York, who was formerly chairman for himself a place among the leaders of the House. As DAVID HOGG, of Indiana; Hon. ROBERT HOGG, of West Virginia; and Hon. VICTOR HOUSTON, of Hawaii; all splendid men who served the Republic well.

One of the outstanding points that can be made in connection with the deliberations of our committee is that the question of politics never divides the men on either side of the table. Realizing the tremendous responsibility of conducting this gigantic industry, the members of the committee, the Post Office Department's board of directors, leave politics outside the committee room; and these men whose names I have just read to you carried on in that manner. They are esteemed and respected by every one of us. For my colleagues of the committee as well as for myself personally, we trust they will enjoy the fullest measure of success. [Applause.]

(A copy of the resolutions adopted by the committee follows:)

Whereas La Fayerte L. Patterson, A. D. Sanders, David Hogg, Frank P. Bohn, Robert L. Hogg, and V. S. K. Houston have rendered faithful and distinguished service as members of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads of the House of Representatives, and have ably demonstrated their statesmanship, honesty, integrity, and ability in the consideration of legislation considered by the committee: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads of the House of Representatives of the Seventy-second Congress go on record as expressing its deep regret at the departure of these esteemed and distinguished Members, who will be missed both personally and officially during the further deliberations of the committee in the next Congress, wishing each of them a long, healthful, and happy life in whatever occupation they may be found, marked by even greater triumphs than those of the past, and further hoping that these Members will some day choose to return to Congress and that we shall all meet again to work together in the splendid friendliness that has characterized every committee endeavor; and he it further committee endeavor; and be it further

Resolved, That this resolution be inscribed upon the minutes of the committee and a copy sent to each of the distinguished Members mentioned herein.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks by inserting in the RECORD a report of the officials of the Gorgas Memorial Institute, for which we make an appropriation of $50,000 a year. The Surgeon Generals of the Army, of the Navy, and of the Public Health Service are ex officio members of the institute. Admiral Grayson is the chairman.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it an extensive report?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. It will cover several pages of the RECORD.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it not printed otherwise?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. No; and it is primarily for the benefit of the medical profession and for the foreign countries that contribute funds to the institute. It is a very informing report and is made annually.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, Minnesota did not escape the political tidal wave which swept over the country last November with a force rarely before witnessed. In our State seven sitting Members fell by the wayside, and in their departure from this body the State and Nation sustain a great loss.

During the entire time of their incumbency it has been my privilege to have served with them. I therefore feel that I am in position to give a fairly accurate appraisal of their work and accomplishments while they have labored

Hon. FRANK CLAGUE, of the second Minnesota district, came to Congress 12 years ago, and in that time has made member of the Committee on Agriculture he for a number of years played an important part in writing the several relief measures that were early passed by Congress. His work on that important committee was so conspicuous that he was later placed on the Appropriations Committee, where he also rendered his country outstanding service. His retirement is a real loss.

Hon. A. H. Andresen, of the third Minnesota, is another Member who has made for himself an enviable position in this body. Mr. Andresen first became a Member of the House in the Sixty-ninth Congress. Immediately he was named to the powerful Agricultural Committee, where he has labored long and effectively in behalf of the American farmer. As a coauthor of the migratory bird act he has earned for himself a place among the sincere conservationists of the country.

Another valuable Member from Minnesota who will not be with us in the next Congress is Hon. Melvin J. Maas, of the fourth Minnesota district, who first became a Member of this body in the Seventieth Congress. A former service man with a distinguished overseas record in the Marine aviation section, it was but natural that he should early attain a position of prominence in this body. As a member of the Foreign Affairs Committee Mr. Maas has taken an energetic interest in our foreign relations and has fought in season and out of season to secure an equitable settlement of the so-called overflow cases now pending between this and the Canadian Governments.

Hon. C. G. Selvig, who also retires from Congress after six years of splendid service in this body, came here with a background that has enabled him to render most effective work in behalf of agriculture. Prior to becoming a Member of the House, Mr. Selvig was president of the Minnesota Northwest Agricultural School. His long and distinguished service in that position gave him a wonderful perspective of our agricultural problems and he has not been sparing in his efforts to bring real relief to the American farmer. Mr. Selvig has been particularly active in promoting goodroads legislation through the Committee on Roads, of which he is a member. His service on the Labor Committee has also been characterized by effective and conscientious work.

Another World War veteran to retire at this time is Hon. Victor Christgau, who was first elected to Congress in 1928. Mr. Christgau, in addition to being a legislator, is a real dirt farmer, operating a farm near Austin, Minn. A graduate from our School and College of Agriculture, and a practical farmer, it was to be expected that he would take a keen interest in the major problem to confront the country and Congress the past 13 years. During his service here he has been most diligent and faithful in his support of legislation intended to relieve agriculture. Mr. Christgau's practical experience as a farmer has stood him in good stead in his service in this body. During his incumbency he has visited Europe several times to make a first-hand study of agricultural conditions in competing lands. In his retirement from Congress American agriculture loses a worthy champion.

One of the hardest workers in the House is Hon. WILLIAM A. PITTENGER, of the eighth Minnesota district. He is one of the first to arrive in his office in the morning and among the last to leave in the evening. Mr. PITTENGER possesses courage and good judgment in a marked degree, and has at all times commanded the respect and good will of his colleagues. When Mr. PITTENGER first came here he found on his doorstep the so-called "fire sufferers" claim which had been shuttled back and forth in preceding Congresses. With his usual forcefulness he took hold of the matter, and after lengthy hearings and much contact work he succeeded in having the claim favorably reported from the Committee on Claims. Due to opposition from hostile sources the measure has not been favorably acted upon by the House as a whole. In Mr. PITTENGER's retirement northeastern Minnesota, of which the city of Duluth is a most important part, will be without a local Representative in the Seventythird Congress, but that defect will doubtless be remedied by the return of Mr. PITTENGER to Congress two years hence.

Hon. W. I. Nolan, of the Minneapolis district, was elected four years ago to succeed Hon. Walter H. Newton, who had resigned to accept a secretaryship with President Hoover. Mr. Nolan came here fortified with a long and distinguished career in the Minnesota Legislature, which included two terms as speaker of the house and four years as lieutenant governor. Mr. Nolan's retirement is a severe loss to the House and his constituents. He is an outstanding parliamentarian and was just entering upon what we had all hoped would be a long and outstanding period of service in this body. Unfortunately, the wave of discontent that swept over the land in November, and which submerged good and bad alike claimed him as a victim of its resentment. I feel confident that when the passions of the electorate have subsided two years hence Mr. Nolan will be fully vindicated by reelection to this body.

Mr. Speaker, I can not permit this moment to escape without paying a short tribute to the memory of our late departed friend and colleague, Hon. Godfrey G. Goodwin, whose untimely passing two weeks ago we yet mourn. While I have already paid my respects to his memory, I feel that my colleagues would have me say a word about his faithful and effective service as a member of the great Committee on Banks and Banking, upon which Mr. Goodwin served with outstanding distinction the past eight years. Only the other day the chairman of that committee told me that he considered Mr. Goodwin one of the most able and faithful members of that body, and in that appraisal I am most happy to concur.

To one and to all I say, May health, happiness, and prosperity follow you and yours, and may you all return to this body two years hence. The Nation needs men of your rugged honesty, wisdom, and faithfulness.

rugged honesty, wisdom, and faithfulness.

Mrs. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from California?

There was no objection.

Mrs. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, California has added her quota to the list of Republican casualties, and among those who have gone down to defeat are men who are a distinct loss not only to our State but to the Nation. Heading this too long list is the name of Mr. Barbour, whose conscientious service on the Committee on Appropriations is known to all of you. It is unfortunate that, frequently, the people at home have little realization of the great work for the Nation so many of our colleagues do here.

Mr. ARTHUR FREE, a valuable member of the Committee on Merchant Marine, Radio, and Fisheries, is another, and his work in the interest of the merchant marine will be of ever greater significance as the years go by.

The name of Phil Swing will be connected for generations to come with one of the greatest projects of modern times, the Hoover Dam. The years of hard work, in season and out, resulted eventually in his victory, and to him is due all the credit of its success. He aspired to a higher office and then withdrew too late to run for reelection.

Mr. Crail, of Los Angeles, too, ran unsuccessfully for the senatorial nomination, and so retires from the House.

And the last, a comparatively new Member, Mr. Forrest Curry, though only serving his first term, bade fair to follow in the footsteps of his illustrious father. To all of them we wish Godspeed and success and hope that time will deal kindly with them and eventually return them to our side of the aisle. [Applause.]

SPENDING THE PEOPLE'S MONEY

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, before addressing myself to the subject matter that I desire to discuss briefly I want to acknowledge the very great debt that all members of the Appropriations Committee and the Congress, regardless of party, owe to the chairman of the committee, Mr. Byrns, who will be the Democratic floor leader in the next Congress, and to Mr. Wood of Indiana, the outgoing Republican ranking member of the committee, for their indefatigable services and leadership looking to the protection of the National Treasury.

The other day a most interesting discussion occurred in this Chamber by Representative Stafford, of Wisconsin, on whether or not the present plan of handling appropriations in the House of Representatives should be modified. Mr. Stafford suggested a sort of liaison arrangement between legislative committees and appropriation subcommittees dealing with common subjects.

I have tremendous respect and admiration for my colleague, Representative Stafford. We entered Congress at the same time. His work as a Member of this body has been of notable character, and few Members of the House during my service have contributed so distinctively as has the gentleman from Wisconsin to accuracy and definiteness in legislative procedure, to the prevention of waste, and to the orderly processes of government. His career in the Congress has been one of outstanding service. It is thus with hesitation that I find myself driven to a conclusion different from the conclusion of my distinguished colleague.

THE OLD PLAN

Prior to 1922 appropriation responsibility in the House was distributed among 8 or 10 committees. True enough, there was an Appropriations Committee, which was charged with jurisdiction over a miscellaneous field, but excepting as it had to do with deficiencies it had nothing whatever to do with naval appropriations, nothing to do with appropriations for post offices and post roads or Indian affairs or agriculture or rivers and harbors or with Army appropriations apart from fortifications. Appropriations for these several activities were handled by legislative committees. The result of this arrangement was utter lack of harmony in budgets from the standpoint of general work performed. It meant duplication of activities; it meant wide differences in compensation; it meant varied promotion, retirement, and pay plans in the Military and Naval Establishments; it meant waste and expenditure of money that coordination could prevent.

A BUDGET SYSTEM

For years there had been agitation in favor of a Federal Budget. Following the World War, with the enormous expanse in national appropriations it was apparent to students of the subject that a more systematic plan must be worked out if the Congress were to have regard for mounting expenditures in peace-time activities. As a part of the general program, the Bureau of the Budget was established, and the General Accounting Office came into being, both set up as agencies of the administrative branch of the Government.

In the House of Representatives, as part of the Budget plan all appropriation authority was lodged in the Committee on Appropriations. The Appropriations Committee was expanded to 35 members. For the immediate handling of the work in efficient manner members were drawn for the extra assignments from the several legislative committees that theretofore had had charge of specific appropriations. Subcommittees were created within the Committee on Appropriations and the members who had been transferred from the legislative committees by reason of their experience and acquaintanceship with the subjects were made subcommittee chairmen.

Under this plan it was expected that the legislative committees would continue to have jurisdiction over the general subjects with which they had been charged, other than appropriations. The Appropriations Committee was properly denied legislative authority. In this way it was believed that touching each appropriation bill there would be in the House of Representatives in addition to the members of the Appropriations Committee reporting supply bills, a fine independent group of members who might be called specialists and who, being responsible for the organic laws touching particular subjects, such as those concerning the War and Navy Departments, Indian Affairs, Rivers and Harbors, Post Offices and Post Roads, and so forth, would be most helpful advisers.

In my judgment, the plan has worked out most successfully, and enormous savings have resulted to the Federal Treasury through the plan that was adopted.

PERSONAL OR LOCAL INTEREST

When we consider the subject of limiting appropriation authority to appropriation committees or diffusing it so that legislative committees may report appropriation bills, we can not be blind to the practice that has come into being of assigning Members to the committees of the House. Unquestionably, the legislative committees are built up very generally upon the basis of the tremendous personal interest of Members in particular subjects.

Thus, the Rivers and Harbors Committee is composed largely of Members whose States are particularly interested in rivers and harbors; Flood Control, mostly of Members interested in flood control; Irrigation and Reclamation, mostly of Members interested in irrigation; and Naval Affairs, mostly of Members from States or districts with naval projects; committees that have to do with pensions, largely of Members of Congress who have seen service in the particular wars to which their work pertains. This is true of other legislative committees. Members seek and are granted assignment for the very reason that they have projects or interests in which they or their districts are concerned.

On the other hand, while the Appropriations Committee must be a cross-section of Members of the House from the standpoint of both party membership and geography, the subcommittees, for the most part, by reason of their being appointed by the chairman of the Appropriations Committee, are controlled by Members, the majority of whom will not be embarrassed by personal projects. I recall that it was phrased by the late Chairman Madden that he wanted members of his subcommittees to be as free and independent as the judge and the jury in the trial of a case.

This, Mr. Speaker, is the most important element in the allocation of work among Members of the House through which economies may be attained.

THE SENATE WAY

In the Senate a different plan is followed. Under the rules each legislative committee has the right to designate three of its members as ex officio members of the particular Senate Appropriations subcommittee having to do with the legislative subject in question and further right of having at least one of its members upon the conference committee. This plan was referred to with apparent approval in the discussion the other day.

While nothing in the rule seems to indicate other rights of the ex officio members of the Senate Appropriations subcommittees, in practice they seem to have full rights, including the right of chairmanship when they may be reached through seniority.

I have no suggestion to make touching this plan of committee construction for the Senate. It unquestionably may result in Senate subcommittees being made up entirely of Members of that body who have projects within their States. It would seem it would require almost superhuman resolution and courage to pursue a course of impartiality and fairness to the country at large. This same practice extends to conferees upon the part of the Senate. Thus a Senate committee in conference on an Interior Department bill carrying an irrigation project might be made up entirely or mostly of Senators with irrigation projects within their States, or a Senate conference committee on the naval bill might be made up mostly or entirely of Senators from States with naval projects.

Let me illustrate: On the naval conference committee in 1931 there were five conferees upon the part of the House and a like number for the Senate. The five conferees upon the part of the House were members of the subcommittee that had prepared and later defended the naval appropriations bill in the House. Only one of this committee was from a State with a naval project and it was not located within his district. The conferees from the other body were made up as follows: Two of the five were from one State that had one of the largest naval projects in our country within its borders; two were from adjoining States between which is a river at whose mouth is located another fine naval industrial plant, and whose employees and their families live the fifth member was from a State that did not have a naval activity.

Granted that the four Members from the other body that represented States that were tremendously and vitally interested in naval projects were men who were willing to sacrifice their personal wishes for the sake of sound policy, I submit that it is not fair to them to be placed in the position of a judge and jury determining a cause in which they are concerned.

More than that, it is not fair to the two bodies of the Congress to be asked to rely so heavily upon the advice of a committee that is built up of members who have direct interests to represent that would seem might prevent them from arriving at honest conclusions no matter how good may be their intentions and how lofty their purposes. Members of the House know the unfortunate effect of highpressure minority-group organizations. What shall we say of the pressure of thousands of citizens of a community upon a member of the subcommittee when they hold the fate of his continuance in office upon the point of their pencils as they enter the election booth? The same illustration may be used with respect to other conference

If the Congress, regardless of party that may be in control, is to function efficiently and with the best and highest interest of our country in view, appropriation authority must rest primarily with committees that are able to act with impartial judgment as they handle their work. The legislative committee may continue to be an aggressive committee made up in large part of those who represent projects and establishments personally and who thereby will be compelled to be acquainted with the subjects. They may be partisan or special pleaders. No one can say that the members of these legislative committees are not highly informed men and women. They are particularly informed upon the specific subject with which they are concerned. No one can say that the House, in the consideration of appropriation bills, is not benefited by having the attrition of discussion upon the part of the members of legislative committees as they criticize and hold up to minute inspection the bills reported from the Appropriations Committee.

TEAM WORK

In the functioning of these committees there must be coordination; there must be team work. In the past, time and time again, the appropriations subcommittees have come face to face with factors where legislation was imperative and the committees have called these factors to the attention of the proper legislative committee which has been free to respond. Oftentimes an appropriations subcommittee has indicated that its members would not raise the point of order of legislation against an amendment if offered from the appropriate legislative committee. This course has been followed frequently. It was followed, as Members will recall, last week, when the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. Vinson, upon behalf of the Naval Affairs Committee, offered an amendment to the naval appropriations bill, increasing the limit of cost upon aircraft carriers, an amendment which the Appropriations Committee would not have thought of proposing.

The legislative committees have been very gracious in receiving these suggestions from the Committee on Appropriations. On the other hand, the naval appropriations subcommittees have been glad to welcome before it individual members of the Naval Affairs Committee or members of the Naval Affairs Committee acting in the capacity of a subcommittee speaking for the full committee as they have presented some matter in which they were interested. This has been the practice for many years; always, so far as I am aware. An illustration in both lines may be found by turning to the hearings of the present Congress.

It may be that closer teamwork could be developed between the respective legislative and appropriation subcommittees. It may be that more frequent consideration by the House should be had of bills reported from major legis-and form a very important factor within those two States; | may be that the Holman rule should be abolished or restricted, but in my judgment if the Congress is to have regard for economies and for orderly handling of work, all appropriation authority must be lodged in one committee.

> Legislative and appropriation committees, though dealing with the same subjects, have distinctive problems to consider, distinctive work to do, and most important of all their personnel is built up along different lines.

> In the interest of good government, in the interest of soundest economies, we must not strip the Appropriations Committee of the independence that comes from having subcommittees that are composed essentially of Members who have no personal or selfish interest to serve, no matter what their conclusion may be. They must be as free as the judge and the jury in a case. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the gentleman have two minutes more in order that I may ask him a

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. Ayres). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. May I interpolate here and say, in view of the fact that the gentleman did me so much honor as to give his opinion on the proposition I advanced some weeks ago, that I thought, after much reflection, that it would add to the acumen of the Appropriations Committee and also to the legislative committee which would have representation on the Appropriations Subcommittee. The proposal does not involve taking away majority control of the Appropriations Committee in the framing of the appropriation bills. I know that the Committee on Military Affairs has suffered tremendously in prestige and functioning since appropriating powers were taken away.

No harm can come to the War Department Appropriations Subcommittee by having a minority representation on that committee from the Military Affairs Committee, sitting in with it and giving that subcommittee the benefit of its legislative experience, and in turn imbibing from the hearings before the committee matters of value that can be transferred to the legislative committee. It is furthest from my mind to take away the control of the Committee on Appropriations, but I wish to replenish the committee with some ideas with respect to legislative policy and in turn to allow the valuable hearings before the Committee on Appropriations to be of benefit to the legislative committee.

THANKS TO RETIRING MEMBERS

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? There was no objection.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House of Representatives, in behalf of the people of the Mississippi Valley I wish to extend sincere thanks and grateful appreciation to the entire membership of the House, and especially to the retiring members of the Committee on Flood Control, for the valuable service and assistance rendered in the passage of legislation by which the Federal Government has undertaken the final solution of the great problem of flood control of the Mississippi River and its tributaries in its alluvial valley. This also applies to the Sacramento River, Calif.

Of the retiring Members on the Republican side I refer to the gentleman from Iowa, Hon. WILLIAM F. KOPP, who has given valuable support to these great projects; and also to Hon. PHILIP D. SWING, of California, whose support has been an important factor in securing the approval and continued progress in the execution of the work in the Mississippi Valley and on the Sacramento River, Calif.

We have also had the complete cooperation and assistance of Hon. SEYMOUR H. PERSON, of Michigan; Hon. John E. WEEKS, of Vermont; and Hon. WILBUR M. WHITE, of Ohio.

Retiring on the Democratic side is Hon. James Fulbright, of Missouri, who has been aggressive in action for the people lative committees than calendar Wednesday now affords. It of his district, State, and Nation. My own colleague, Hon. JOHN H. OVERTON, of Louislana, also leaves the committee by promotion to the Senate, where his splendid services will be continued in a position of advancement and widened scope of action.

There are many other retiring Members to whom we are likewise indebted and whose services will always be gratefully remembered.

Our friendship and all good wishes for their future success and happiness will go and continue with them.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? There was no objection.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I take this time to pay a tribute of respect to the distinguished Ohioans who are retiring from this Congress to-morrow. I regret that I am doing this extemporaneously, for the deeds of my colleagues justify an eulogy in language worthy of the most eloquent orator.

Ohio has long since been a great bulwark of Republicanism—the names Grant, Garfield, Hayes, Harrison, McKinley, Taft, and Harding bear everlasting proof of the purity and power of Ohio's Republicanism. In spite of this strong party inclination Ohio was not able to withstand the inundating wave of Democratic ascendency that overwhelmed the country last fall. Ohio has the misfortune this year to lose eight very distinguished Representatives in the Congress of the United States. Long tenure in office brings power and influence more inevitably than almost any other political position.

Mr. Frank Murphy came here 14 years ago. By reason of his strength of character and affability he soon impressed himself upon the membership of the House and was soon elevated to the distinguished position of membership of the Committee on Appropriations. This committee passes upon all measures that carry appropriations. It is one of the most powerful committees of the House. His work there so distinguished him that he was elevated to the position of chairman of the subcommittee dealing with the Interior Department. As such chairman he had the responsibility of appropriations aggregating many millions of dollars. Mr. Murphy will be missed in this House but I feel sure that his affability, his strength and courage is a sure augury of his return two years from now. His capacity as a business man and his understanding of legislation dealing with business were responsible for his splendid record as a Congressman.

The same year that Mr. MURPHY came, Mr. C. Ellis Moore also came. He distinguished himself before he came to this body as a lawyer, as a man of learning and skill in the administration of legal matters. His skill and proficiency in that respect soon impressed itself upon this body, and he naturally gravitated to the Committee on the Judiciary where he has rendered a noteworthy service. While a member of this committee he was selected as one of a small committee to conduct the impeachment trial of United States Judge English. This was a most signal honor, and his selection is proof of his standing among his associates. Mr. Moore is one of the most convincing speakers in the House. His convictions that the eighteenth amendment should stay in the Constitution has given him an opportunity to prove his ability, and has given the House and the country an opportunity to judge of his sterling character. Mr. Moore will go back to his district where he has lived and is revered, and will no doubt continue to be a power in Ohio's political, educational, and legal affairs. His sincere advocacy of prohibition and his firm defense of the purity of the youth of America have made him a national leader on these subjects. His skill as a legislator was well demonstrated on many occasions.

Mr. Charles Brand is an agriculturist of national reputation. His ability in this line was demonstrated here on many occasions and in many ways. He retires from Congress voluntarily. He has been for many years one of Ohio's leading authorities on matters of agriculture, and I am glad to bear that testimony to his ability in that respect. Mr. Brand made a special study of tariffs as they affected the farmer. His speeches in this House on these subjects marked him as an authority, and he was often consulted by students of the subject. He will be succeeded by Mr. L. W. Marshall, a Republican, of Xenia.

Mr. Cable served four years here and voluntarily retired, but his constituency returned him, and he has served another four years. He retires to his home in Lima, where he has for many years enjoyed an extensive and lucrative practice as a lawyer. His practice carries him over all the State of Ohio. While in Congress he distinguished himself probably more than any other individual in his extensive studies of naturalization of aliens. He was during all his time as a Congressman a member of the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization. He was a stalwart defender of the American against the other peoples of the world, and his work in that respect brought him an acquaintanceship among the immigration authorities that was coextensive with the boundaries of the country.

He knows more about naturalization than any man in the National Congress on either side of the aisle. He is the author of the naturalization act of September 22, 1922, known throughout the world as the Cable Act, granting independent citizenship rights to American women. He secured the passage of two amendments to that law in 1930 and 1931 so that in matters of nationality women have equal rights with men. He has published a book and other articles on that subject, and the women of the country know him because of his battles in their behalf to bring up the naturalization laws so that there might be uniformity between the rights of men and women. Mr. Cable is also the author of our Federal corrupt practices act, and he helped write our 1921 and 1924 immigration laws.

Mr. McClintock came to this Congress four years ago, after having established himself in his home community as one of the leading lawyers there. His conduct of a very noteworthy criminal case brought him to the forefront as one of America's most effective and skillful prosecuting attorneys. His skill in the handling of that case made him a national figure. His election to Congress was, in a measure, the spontaneous demand of an appreciative people that this public servant should be promoted. In Congress he has continued that reputation and leaves us with the respect of the whole Membership. No doubt he will be returned by his constituency if he desires.

Grant Mouser, Jr., has followed in the footsteps of his illustrious father, who also was a Member of this House of Representatives. Mr. Mouser brought to his work here a pleasing and forceful personality. His natural ability, augmented by a comprehensive education and a thorough training, equipped him admirably for the work as a legislator. His connection with ex-service men put him in position to serve them in an unusual manner.

His district was ably represented during his tenure, and he leaves Congress with the best wishes of all. No doubt he will continue to be an outstanding citizen in whatever company he might find himself.

Francis Seiberling found service on the important Banking and Currency Committeee, to which place he was admirably and peculiarly fitted. As a business man of wide experience and a lawyer of skill and ability, he had such a background as to make him an influential member of this great committee. Mr. Seiberling was sought for his judgment on financial and banking questions. The Congress will miss him and his place will be difficult to fill.

The Toledo district has been especially fortunate in having had as its Representative a man of the accomplishments of Mr. Wilbur M. White. His youth and vigor stood him well in hand in enabling him to do the work of a metropolitan district. Mr. White is a man of great versatility, which enabled him to discuss most abstruse questions with a readiness that marked him as one who would with longer tenure in the House advance to the highest positions.

Ohio is a Republican State on national issues, and it took the most irresistible political landslide in the history of our country to shake her from her political moorings. Ohio promises to lend every reasonable assistance to Mr. Roosevelt and his administration, for Americanism precedes and preponderates partisanship in Ohio. These illustrious servants will be succeeded by Democrats, except in the case of Mr. Brand, who will be succeeded by a Republican. These new Members will find that their predecessors have wrought faithfully and well, and their records and conduct are worthy of emulation. I am proud to say these few words in behalf of my friends and colleagues, all of whom I respect.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. Ayres). The time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Jenkins] has expired.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer a few words with reference to the Members of the House from the State of Iowa who have served in this House for a number of years and who will not return after the gavel falls at noon

ED H. CAMPBELL, before coming to this House, was a member of the State Senate of Iowa for two terms, where he served with distinction. Since coming to the House of Representatives he has been a member of the Veterans' Committee, where he has performed a great service, and I know all wish for him success in the coming years.

CHARLES E. SWANSON came to this House at the same time Mr. Campbell came and has served for four years. Prior to coming to the House he was prosecuting attorney in his county for a number of years, where he gained distinction in the legal profession. When he came to the House he was immediately placed on the Committee on the Judiciary, a distinction which is seldom given to a young man just entering the House. I want to say for him he has been a faithful and valuable member of this committee.

T. J. B. Robinson before coming to the House was a member of the State Senate of Iowa, where he attained distinction as a legislator. Since coming here he has been a member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, where he has rendered a valuable and patriotic service. The ranking Republican member of this committee, the gentleman from New York [Mr. PARKER], paid to him and to other members of this committee a fine tribute for the services they have rendered to the committee and to the House. We will all miss his genial and courteous association.

CYRENUS COLE came to the House in the Sixty-seventh Congress and has been a Member of the House for 12 years. He voluntarily retires from the Congress after the close of this session. Before coming to the House he was a newspaper editor, publisher, and writer of distinction. He is a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, where he has served faithfully and patriotically, and has the esteem and confidence not only of the members of that committee but of all the Members of this House.

WILLIAM F. KOPP came to the House in the Sixty-seventh Congress and has been a Member of the House for 12 years. Before election to the House he was a member of the Legislature of Iowa, where he served with distinction. He has been chairman of the Labor Committee of the House and also of the Pensions Committee. Other speakers to-day have referred to him as a most valuable member of these committees. He is one of the hard-working Members of the House and has served with distinction wherever he has been placed and will be greatly missed. I know every Member will wish him good health and good luck wherever he may be.

C. WILLIAM RAMSEYER came to this House in the Sixtyfourth Congress, at the same time I entered the House. For 18 years he has served in the House. Prior to his election to the House he was county attorney of his county for some years. For a number of years he served as a member of the Rules Committee, where he performed a splendid service for the House. Later he was elected a member of the great Ways and Means Committee, where he performed a real service and gained the distinction of being one of the that our committee has been requested during the present hardest-working members of that committee. He has had a long and faithful service and leaves the House with the high esteem and confidence of its Members.

GILBERT N. HAUGEN came to the House in the Fifty-sixth Congress in 1899. He is not only the oldest Member of this House in point of service but he has the great distinction of having the longest record of continuous service in the House since the Constitution was adopted. To-morrow noon he will have served in the House 34 continuous years. I know it is the judgment of every Member of the House that no more faithful service has ever been rendered on this floor than that rendered by GILBERT N. HAUGEN. For a great many years he was chairman of the great Committee on Agriculture, and no one has been more faithful to the cause of agriculture than has Mr. HAUGEN. He comes from one of the great agricultural States of the Union, and he has patriotically and well represented the interests of that State for the past 34 years. I know it is the wish of every Member of the House that he have a long life and a happy one. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Cochran] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to refer to the retiring Members of the Missouri delegation. I will leave that to the distinguished dean of our delegation, Judge Dickinson. He will pay them a welldeserved tribute.

I rise for the purpose of saying a few words in reference to the members of the committee of which I have the honor to be chairman, the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments. Few realize the vast jurisdiction of this committee. It is one of the most important in the Under our form of government nothing is more essential for the welfare of the people than two great political parties. They constitute the medium through which the people speak. I would not be honest, however, if I did not say that it is my opinion that the latest decision of the people removed some of the most outstanding Members of this body. Men who have rendered great public service, some at a great sacrifice, and men who will be missed not only by Members of the next Congress but by the public as well.

Congressmen are not born; they are made. No man can come here and in his first term expect to extend the service to the people of the country as men who have served here for years. Strange as it may be to some, many leaders in this House have rendered service to the country for which they received no credit from their constituents. Hidden away in committee rooms for weeks, sometimes months, they work on important legislation that brings no direct benefit to the people of the district they represent, but legislation that must be enacted in order that the Government be properly conducted. The passage of some small bill directly affecting a Member's district brings him more credit from his constituents than months of labor on some great appropriation bill. He might have been instrumental in saving the taxpayers hundreds of millions of dollars, but they do not hear of it. They are not interested because they are not what might be said directly affected, but they are indirectly affected by the Member's work.

The committee over which I preside, and of which I have been a member ever since it was organized, loses the Hon. WILLIAM WILLIAMSON, of South Dakota; John B. Colton, of Utah; GUY E. CAMPBELL, of Pennsylvania; John C. SCHAFER, of Wisconsin; EDMUND F. COOKE, of New York; FREDERICK M. DAVENPORT, of New York-Republicans; and JOHN W. MOORE, of Kentucky; Guinn Williams, of Texas; and John H. Overton, of Louisiana-Democrats. The last name goes to the Senate. Some are retiring voluntarily, others went down in the landslide of last November.

More legislation of a controversial nature is referred to this committee than to any other committee in the House of Representatives. I think I can say without exaggeration Congress to institute no less than 100 investigations. After careful thought and study, our investigations have been few.

While we have differed, we have labored for the benefit of the country. No bill ever came to the committee on which there was a full agreement. The cooperation I have received has enabled me to get results. Had it not been for that cooperation, it would have been a very hard matter to have brought any legislation to the floor. When in the minority, I always followed the policy of cooperating with the chairman, Mr. Williamson, of South Dakota, and I have been well repaid by him for the cooperation I extended to him. A man of outstanding ability, he gave to the committee the benefit of his experience, not only as a Member of Congress for many years but he likewise was most prominent in the discussion of legal questions which were continually before the Members. Mr. Colton, of Utah, rarely failed to attend a meeting and participate in the many arguments that arose; friendly arguments that always ended in better legislation. Mr. Campbell was a Member who likewise rendered valuable service. Our friend, John C. Schafer, of Wisconsin, possessed a knowledge of the inside workings of the Government equaled by few men. An untiring worker, always present, he deserves great credit for the able manner in which he not only assisted in perfecting bills but also for the information he would secure in questioning witnesses who appeared either in favor of or opposition to legislation. No one who knows John Schafer can ever doubt his sincerity, and he is a real loss. Mr. DAVENPORT, of New York, an outstanding scholar on public questions, will be missed in the next Congress. No one who knows him can fail to admire his past public service. Mr. Moore, of Kentucky, and Mr. WILLIAMS, of Texas, leave of their own accord. They were a real help to me and their places will be hard to fill. The other member of the committee who will be absent when the roll is called in the next Congress, the gentleman from Louisiana, Mr. Overton, goes to the Senate. In the other body he will continue his good work. While we will miss him, still we all rejoice in his advancement. To our committee came the problem of reorganization of the Government. I have always taken the position that the Government should be reorganized. Many bureaus should be consolidated and others should be eliminated. However, due to a division of opinion, the committee was not able to make as much progress as was desired, although four reorganization bills were reported by our committee during the present Congress. Some have been enacted into law.

The duties of the committee will be lessened to some extent by the recent action of Congress in delegating to the President the power to reorganize, consolidate, group, and eliminate Government agencies. This is a great task. It is a most important task, and care must be exercised that mistakes are not made. Men who have knowledge of the working of Government departments are the ones who should offer the suggestion in reference to reorganization.

The President has selected as the Director of the Budget Hon. Lewis Douglas, of Arizona [applause], and he will have much to say on the question of reorganization. I served with Mr. Douglas on the Economy Committee. I can not conceive of any man, young or old, who is better fitted for this position. We have heard a great deal about how the Appropriations Committee has reduced the Budget figures. I predict now that this committee will have a hard time shaving the estimates that he submits. He will bring about the savings so much desired by the people of the country.

Mr. Douglas is working now on reorganization. I have talked with him on several occasions, and next week expect to spend a day with him at his invitation. I will render every assistance possible to him, and will give him the benefit of my experience, if it will be of any aid to him, on reorganization matters. It is a big field and one where hundreds of millions can be saved. I fully concur that the only way the executive branch can be reorganized is by granting the Chief Executive the power to effect consolidations. has been done, and, while no hasty action should be taken, I hope the day is not far distant when the work will begin. It is not necessary to do the job at one time. It is too im- | for none other than Mac Lankford, of Norfolk.

portant, as one mistake might result in costing the taxpayers many more millions than will be saved.

This is a time when all should work together, regardless of politics; cooperate for the benefit of the people of the country; pass legislation that will be beneficial to all, which in the end will mean the end of the depression, which all so much desire. Restoration of confidence is all that is needed.

I know we have the best wishes of all who are leaving us to-morrow. Some will return, others may never return, but to all I extend my best wishes for good health and happiness. [Applause.]

And to the members of the Committee on Expenditures who are retiring, I want to thank each and every one for your support and your loyalty, and I wish you well, as I know all the other Members of the House wish you well. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GILLEN] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. GILLEN. Mr. Speaker, something has been said here to-day relative to a tidal wave that swept over the country last November. That tidal wave did not hit me. A very high wave laded with considerable dampness struck me in the primary, and while I am retiring at the end of one term's service, I can not leave this body without expressing to every Member of this House appreciation for the many courtesies that have been shown to me. Before I came here, aye, even before my certificate of election was issued, Members of this House very graciously offered their assistance in any way that they could be of assistance, and after coming here and serving through what seems to me this short term. I have grown to love every Member of this House, and especially the fine friends that I have made; and when I leave here I go with the same high regard that I had of this House before coming. I felt that the men and women elected to this body came here with high purpose, with integrity, to give their all to the service of their constituents and to their country, and it will be my pleasure back in private life to defend the Members of this House with whom I have come in contact against unjust criticism that often appears in the press and that often comes from the lips of unthinking people. [Applause.]

While it becomes my lot to bid you good-by, I would not have you understand that the farewell is final. I thank you. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Bland] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I feel that if Mr. MONTAGUE, the distinguished dean of the Virginia delegation, were not confined to a bed of illness, he would desire to say something about the Virginia Members who are leaving Congress, and I shall try, inadequately though it be, to supply his place for just a minute.

Three of the Virginia Members go out, two on my side of the aisle and one on the other. One of these Members, the Hon. Joel Floop, came in only at this session of Congress, and yet we have learned to know him, appreciate him, and feel that he has the ability for great public service. He comes to us with a distinguished name, and is the half brother of the gentleman who rendered such valuable service in the House many years ago, the Hon. Hal D. Flood.

Another who has served for a full term, Representative FISHBURNE, has endeared himself to us by his friendly manner, his scholarly attainments, his marked ability, and his earnest, faithful performances of duty. It is a matter of deep regret to all of his colleagues that he does not see fit to return to Congress; he retires voluntarily.

On the other side of the aisle is the gentleman from Norfolk [Mr. Lankford], who has served in the Congress of the United States for two years with distinction and ability. He is better known to us as "Mac." We wish for him all the good things of life. Just as long as he undertakes to come to Congress on the Republican ticket, of course, we shall have to contest his ambition and his aspiration; but if the fortune of war should be that from the section from which he comes a Republican is to be sent, we could wish

Now, I wish to pass from the Virginians to the committee of which I am a member, the Committee on the Merchant Marine, Radio, and Fisheries. There pass to-morrow from these halls gentlemen who have rendered real service to the country in building up the American merchant marine, in writing the radio laws, and in writing fisheries legislation. To call the names of these men will in itself be evidence of the loss which the House will sustain.

On the Republican side we lose Arthur M. Free, Frederick W. Magrady, Frank L. Bowman, Robert H. Clancy, Charles A. Kading, Victor S. K. Houston, of Hawaii, and James Wickersham, of Alaska. Some of these gentlemen, particularly Mr. Free, have been members of this committee for a long time and have contributed considerably great work in the building up of the American merchant marine.

On the Democratic side, we lose the Hon. ROBERT D. JOHNSON, a man of genial attainments, of great industry, faithful in his attendance upon the sessions of the committee, and a man who has shown that the people really did a good thing in sending him here. We regret to see him leave.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. Ayres). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLAND. Then I wish to call attention to one more who goes out of these halls whose place can not, in my opinion, be filled. I say with all honesty that it would be a much greater pleasure to me personally to sit at the right hand of the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. EWIN L. DAVIS, and see him at the head of the table as chairman of this great committee than to attempt to fill the place that is made vacant by his departure, for it can not be filled. The gentleman from Tennessee, Hon. Ewin L. Davis, helped to write the legislation of 1920; he helped to write the bill of 1928, and he has grown up with the American merchant marine. He probably knows more about its affairs, its ramifications, and its needs than any other man in the Congress of the United States and, I may add, as well as, if not better than, any man in the United States. He has shown himself an earnest, hard, indefatigable worker in all the matters of the committee. He contributed a great part in the writing of the radio bill in 1927; and one of the most important amendments in that bill, which carries equality to all the sections of the country, will ever carry his name in that it is known as the Davis amendment. Then in his devotion to the fisheries industry he helped to write the fisheries bill which now appears upon the statute book of the United States.

We shall miss him, we shall miss his services, we shall miss all of these gentlemen, and the Committee on the Merchant Marine, Radio, and Fisheries will find it very difficult to even approximate the industry, the indefatigability, and the energy of these men who have served on that committee for so many years. We know that it will be hard—very, very hard—to even attempt to fill the places of these men who leave us. We bid them Godspeed in life. [Applause.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, it has been my privilege to serve on the Appropriations Committee for the last 10 years. At this time we are losing such a large number of our Membership, I think 14 out of 35, or two-fifths of the total, that I feel I should say a word or so in appreciation of the remarkable service that has been given to the country by these men.

WILL R. Wood, of Indiana, one of the most forceful characters that the House has ever seen, has served in the Congress for 18 years, and on the Appropriations Committee for almost all of this time. He has been a bulwark against raids upon the Treasury. No one more than he has been responsible for the stopping of unwise and unnecessary appropriations. [Applause.]

Beside this, he has rendered remarkable service to his party and to his country as chairman of the Republican to this committee. It Congressional Campaign Committee. During his incumare obliged to go out.

bency of this position, the Republican Party has controlled Congress most of the time. His work has been like that of shock troops—always ready to come out on the floor and fight for what he thought was right.

EDWARD H. WASON, of New Hampshire, has been in Congress the same length of time as Mr. Wood, and for almost the same length of time on the Appropriations Committee. Like Mr. Wood he has rendered great service in the cause of economy in the Government of the United States.

Mr. Wason has served on the Agricultural Committee and the independent offices subcommittee and on the deficiency committee with great zeal and remarkable vitality.

Burton L. French came to Congress in 1903, and has been in continuous service with the exception of four years. I served with him 10 years on the Appropriations Committee. I have never known a man to give more of himself to the country than has Burton L. French, and I think his colleagues on the floor of the House have appreciated it in the remarkable confidence they have placed in him.

His valedictory here this afternoon was not a farewell, for I believe he is coming back to us in two years, but his parting was a warning against the destruction of the great Appropriations Committee, which guards the people's Treasury.

MILTON W. SHREVE came here in 1913, and has been here 20 years, with the exception of four years when he was out. He has been chairman of the subcommittee of the State Department appropriation committee, and during that time has been most untiring and devoted himself in session and out to careful thought and study of all matters relating to his committee, and has therefore been able to report bills which were a credit to the Appropriations Committee and a credit to Congress.

FRANK MURPHY, of Ohio, has been here 18 years, and has given you absolutely his best. He has always been faithful in his attendance and work on the committee, and his service in the Interior Department subcommittee and the Legislative subcommittee has been of great value to the country.

JOHN W. SUMMERS, of Washington, has likewise been here 14 years. He has served faithfully on the Agriculture Committee and on the Independent Offices Committee, and has done a remarkable job, not only in protecting the Treasury of the United States but in looking after the interests of his constituents in Washington.

Henry E. Barbour, of California, has been here also 14 years. He was for a considerable period of time chairman of the military subcommittee of the House. It was my privilege to serve with him for four years, and during that time I came to know and appreciate his real value.

I do not think that any other man in the House has a better knowledge of the needs and requirements of the Army than has Mr. Barbour. I believe we are going to miss the type of service that he has given to the House while on this committee.

GUY U. HARDY, of Colorado, has been here 14 years. He became a member of the committee when I did. He has been a real apostle of economy, always dependable in work that might save the Treasury from unreasonable and unfair obligations.

MAURICE H. THATCHER came here when I did, and went on the committee in his first term. He has given the very best of his services to Congress, and has been of great value to the country.

Frank Clague, of Minnesota, came here in 1921, and has been on the committee for the last eight years. I served with him four years on the military appropriations subcommittee. Judge Clague gave to that committee his sound and valuable judgment. He was of tremendous value in analyzing and working out the problems that came before the committee and in promoting economy in government. We regret that he is going to leave us.

ROBERT SIMMONS, of Nebraska, and WILLIAM P. HOLADAY, of Illinois, have given very marked and valuable services to this committee. It is a crime that men of such value are obliged to go out.

They have each of them been forceful on the floor, intelligent and militant in defense of the Treasury.

On the other side of the House we are losing Judge Wright, of Georgia, and Lewis Douglas, of Arizona, two of the most valuable members of the committee. The worst thing about it is that when the committee loses 14 members, it is going to require the most devoted and minute attention on the part of those who come in to serve to accomplish the work that these men have so long borne and who are going to leave. [Applause.]

FURTHER MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A further message from the Senate by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a joint resolution and bills of the House of the following titles:

H. J. Res. 612. Joint resolution to provide for further investigation of expenditures of the Post Office Department;

H.R. 2157. An act for the relief of Arthur I. Neville; and H.R. 14579. An act to provide for the free importation of certain articles exported temporarily for scientific or educational purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate disagrees to the amendments of the House to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 197) entitled "Joint resolution conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims in the claim of P. F. Gormley Co.," requests a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. Steiwer, Mr. White, and Mr. Logan to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 5337) entitled "An act to amend the Federal farm loan act, as amended, to permit loans for additional purposes, to extend the powers of Federal land banks in the making of direct loans, to authorize upon certain terms the reamortization of loans by Federal and joint-stock land banks, and for other purposes."

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 14458) entitled "An act making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, and for other purposes."

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 14199) entitled "An act making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, and for other purposes," and had agreed to the amendments of the House to the amendments of the Senate Nos. 29 and 30 to said bill.

The message also announced that the Senate insists upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 14643) entitled "An act making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, and for other purposes," disagreed to by the House; agrees to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. Bingham, Mr. Capper, Mr. Nye, Mr. Steiwer, Mr. Glass, Mr. Kendrick, and Mr. Copeland to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

P. F. GORMLEY CO.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate Joint Resolution 197, conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims in the claim of P. F. Gormley Co., with House amendments thereto disagreed to, insist upon the House amendments and agree to the conference.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. Ragon). The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate Joint Resolution 197, with a House amendment thereto, disagreed to by the Senate, insist upon the House amendment, and agree to the conference asked. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Chair appointed the following conferees: Mr. All-good, Mr. Martin of Oregon, and Mr. Sinclair.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen of the House, not as the chairman of any committee but as a Member who has served for many years and has had the privilege to serve with a great many outstanding Members, I deeply regret that to-day we must part with some of our colleagues who have for many years represented the State of Illinois with honor and distinction. The number is rather large, and therefore I shall be deprived of the great pleasure of saying what may and should be said of many of these gentlemen and of their services to the State and the Nation. The casualties in our State are greater than in any other State in the Union. We have lost 13 Members, 10 on the Republican side and 3 on the Democratic side. Many of them have served for many years, and I can truthfully say that every one of these Members has endeavored to serve the Nation and the State to the best of his ability. Illinois has been represented in the House by some of the most outstanding Members. For instance, there is Mr. RICHARD YATES, who is an ex-governor of Illinois. There is Mr. HOLADAY, who has ably represented the district formerly represented by a distinguished Speaker of this House, Uncle Joe Cannon. Then there are Mr. ADKINS, General CHIPERFIELD, JOHN C. ALLEN, HOMER W. HALL, WILLIAM R. JOHNSON, from down State, and all these gentlemen have served the Nation well. Many of them have, of course, differed with me frequently, especially on the most important question that was before the country of late. Had they taken my advice early in the day, I feel that the House would not now be losing them but that they would have continued to serve the State for many years.

In addition to these gentlemen there are two from my own city, Mr. Morton D. Hull and Mr. Carl R. Chindblom, both outstanding Republicans and both men of great ability. It has been my good fortune to serve with and observe the activities of Carl Chindblom. I think in losing him the tenth congressional district of Illinois loses an exceptionally able, sincere, and deserving Member. I myself greatly regret his leaving this House, and I hope that in the near future he may return to continue his services for the district, for the city, for the State, and for the Nation. [Applause.] I wish time would permit me to pay the proper respect and that I were able to express in appropriate periods the feeling that I and my colleagues have for these gentlemen. The State has lost 13 splendid Members. After all, we all know that experience is the best teacher, and after a man has served for two or three terms in this House he becomes specially qualified to be of service to the House and to the Nation.

I have mentioned the names of the gentlemen whom we are losing on the Republican side, and I shall now refer briefly to the three we are losing on the Democratic side, namely, STANLEY KUNZ, JAMES IGOE, and Mr. DIETERICH. True, Mr. DIETERICH has been here for only one term, but during that one term he demonstrated that he possesses an unusual amount of ability and is a man of great resourcefulness. I know that he will be an outstanding member of the other body to which he was elevated in the last election.

In conclusion, I repeat that I regret very much the loss of these Members, and I wish each of them Godspeed and hope that in their new fields of endeavor they will meet with the success to which they are entitled. [Applause.]

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate very greatly the courtesy of the Chair in giving me recognition at this moment, when I know there are other gentlemen who are expecting to take the floor. Since my good friend and colleague from Illinois and Chicago [Mr. Sabath] has made an address, in which he spoke of me, together with other Members from the State of Illinois who are leaving Congress, I wish to say a word in appreciation of his very gracious reference to all of us and particularly to myself. It has been my privilege to serve in this House for 14 years. I need not say to my colleagues that I have intensely enjoyed the service and that I have endeavored to apply myself to it and to give to it the best of my judgment, of my industry, and of my devotion to the welfare of our common country. I appreciate very highly the words of commendation by my colleague on the other side of the aisle and of many Members, both Republicans and Democrats, colleagues all, who during the last few months have cheered me with similar expressions. I wish now to return my most sincere thanks to all of these friends.

This House has preserved its traditions even during recent perilous times. I know there are many who take a delight in calling attention to days of the past, when, forsooth, it is believed that the Congress, and that includes the Senate as well as the House, may have stood higher in the estimation of the people. But those of us who have read history know well that during all times severe criticism has been leveled at the Members of both Houses, and we should not resent such criticism. It is the right of the people to express themselves upon the character of the service which we seek to render, but we in turn, I think, have the right to call the attention of the people to the things which we have done or have tried to do. The Congress of the United States is responsive to the people of the United States. It truly represents the people themselves. The Congress, like all other public officers in a free government, will rise to the character of the people who select them, and, generally speaking, the public service of a free government will be such as the people themselves see fit to secure through their exercise of the right of suffrage.

Mr. Speaker, I have, particularly in recent months, spoken in season and out of season perhaps on the subject of retrenchment and economy and reduction of expenditures and reduction of taxation. At this time, when I am leaving the House, I want to leave a parting word upon that subject. Let there be no mistake, my colleagues. The people of the United States are in earnest with reference to this matter of public expenditures. If the Congress does not respond to this demand, the same fate will overtake those who remain here that befell many of those who depart. I know there is a feeling throughout the land that men in public office are not sufficiently regardful of the interests of the people in the matter of public expenditure. In this connection, Mr. Speaker, I beg to refer to a couple of matters which are now pending here and which illustrate the growth of persistent demands upon the Public Treasury.

In the very early days of my service, when I was a member of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, my attention was called to a building project in the District of Columbia known as the George Washington Memorial, for which Congress had given authority to erect a building upon land to be furnished by the Government. I then said that under that proposal the time would come when a demand would be made upon the Government of the United States to pay the expense of that building project. Its sponsors protested vehemently that no request for funds would ever be presented to the Federal Government. The years have passed. Nothing has been done since the first year of the Harding administration upon this project; and during the last few years we have had bills pending in this House, and one is pending now, asking for an appropriation of $5,000,000 to prosecute that work. In other words, a project which originally was to be a private enterprise will now become a public undertaking and add to the burden of taxation. Not even a technical compliance was made with the original requirement in the act of March 4, 1913, that construction should begin within two years after the passage of that act. Now, after 20 years, only an unsightly foundation adds to the disfiguration of the Mall.

There has just been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary a bill (H. J. Res. 276) which we considered in the Committee on Ways and Means permitting suit to be brought in the courts of the United States, to return to the States millions of dollars of the so-called cotton taxes of the Civil War. These taxes total over $70,000,000. Of course, the original taxpayers can not collect from their graves. The diligent and reasourceful lobbyists for these claims have therefore evolved a theory by which the recoveries from the Federal Government shall escheat to the States, where the taxpayers happened to reside when the taxes were collected. In the Ways and Means Committee I called attention to a case tried in a United States district court in Tennessee where the cotton tax was held valid as an excise tax, and the court rejected the theory that it was an ordinary direct property tax. That case was taken to the United States Supreme Court, where the vote of the court stood 3 to 3, thus amounting to an affirmance of the decision of the court below. I unearthed that case in the docket and files of the Supreme Court. Since no opinion was rendered, the case will not be found in United States Supreme Court reports

I have referred to these two instances, not by way of criticism, but for the purpose of showing how, if we are not careful, if we follow the trend of events, we are constantly bringing the Government into greater expense. The tendency is constantly that way. The inevitable drive is toward new establishments and larger establishments, toward assuming new obligations and larger obligations, until today we have a situation where, in all governmental activities of the United States, people are compelled to pay 25 per cent of their income to the maintenance of government, Federal, State, and local.

My colleagues, I am sorry to strike this note at this moment, but I know that the enforcement of economy is the most important issue before those who stay behind us, in the service of this House. This House has a distinguished past. It has had within its walls the greatest men in our history. It has to-day within its walls, and will have within the near future, the men and women who will carry forward the destinies of our country. I wish you all Godspeed. I wish you all good health and fortune. I wish for the new Congress and the new administration the very best of success. My heart, as I leave you, is filled with gratitude and appreciation for all of the many courtesies and kindnesses which have been extended to me here. If you come to my native city, the city in which I was born, where I have always lived until recently, to the State in which I was born and where I have always resided, both of which city and State I love with all the fervor of my heart, I trust you will at least give me the opportunity of saying "How do you do?" as you pass through, or, as I hope, tarry a while. [Applause.]

ORDER OF BUSINESS

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to make a statement. The Chair has advised a number of Members that there would be nothing of a controversial matter taken up until the end of the session. The Chair finds that there is on the Speaker's table a joint resolution passed by the Senate concerning the banking interests of the District of Columbia, similar in effect to legislation that has been passed by several of the States. The Chair thinks it should be considered.

There is also a conference report from the Committee on Banking and Currency. The Chair will take the privilege of ordering the bells to be rung three times so that the membership will come to the House. In the meantime, the Chair will recognize Members to continue the discussion until the membership arrives in the Chamber.

ALA MOANA CASE IN HAWAII—EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. HOUSTON of Hawaii. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks and to insert a letter written by myself.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the Delegate from Hawaii?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOUSTON of Hawaii. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter from me to Hon. CARL VINSON, chairman Committee on Naval Affairs, March 2, 1933.

> House of Representatives Washington, D. C., March 2, 1933.

Hon. CARL VINSON, M. C., Chairman Committee on Naval Affairs,

House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Last year when the very unfortunate circumstances connected with the so-called Ala Moana case in Hawaii were under investigation the Naval Affairs Committee held a hearing upon this matter. At that time the trial of those who were accused had resulted in a mistrial.

were accused had resulted in a mistrial.

Since that time the law authorities of the Territory and the Pinkerton National Detective Agency (Inc.) had carried on a very extensive and exhaustive investigation of this case. Their report to the governor has only recently been made and, as a result of their report, the matter was brought up in the circuit court of the Territory on Monday, February 13, 1933. The prosecuting attorney asked for a noile prosequi of the case, and the court granted the motion and a noile prosequi was entered. I quote herewith the motion presented to the court by the prosecuting attorney:

"Comes now the Territory of Hawaii, by John C. Kelley, public prosecutor of the city and county of Honolulu, Territory of Hawaii, and respectfully moves that this honorable court approve the within motion for noile prosequi as to each and all of the defendants above named, which said motion is based upon the following reasons, to wit:

reasons, to wit:

"The above-named defendants were indicted by the Territorial grand jury of the first judicial circuit on the 12th day of October, 1931, said indictment charging said defendants with having committed the crime of rape upon the person of the complaining witness, Thalia Hubbard Massie.

"The defendants were brought to trial upon said charge before "The defendants were brought to trial upon said charge before the Hon. A. E. Steadman, then first judge of the circuit court of the first judicial circuit, on the 16th day of November, 1931. After a trial lasting 17 days said case was given to the jury on the 2d day of December, 1931, and said jury after deliberating upon the guilt or innocence of the defendants for a period of 97 hours, informed the court that it was hopelessly deadlocked and unable to agree upon a verdict, were thereupon discharged by the court, and a mistrial entered of record in said cause on the 6th day of December, 1931. December, 1931.

"A careful analysis of the evidence adduced at the former trial indicates clearly the following principal weaknesses in the prosecution's case:

methods employed in securing the identification of

(a) The methods employed in securing the identification of the defendants by the complaining witness.

(b) The lack of medical, physical, and material evidence of the alleged rape upon the complaining witness.

(c) The lack of evidence to overcome the alibi presented by the defendants.

"(a) That the methods employed in procuring the identification by the complaining witness of the defendants in this case and the attempted identification of the defendant's Ida's car and its license number were not in accordance with modern, efficient police methods is conceded.

methods is conceded.

"The complaining witness, when interviewed at her home immediately after the alleged rape had been reported to the police, repeatedly stated to the police officers present that she could not identify her assailants or the car in which they abducted her; that she did not know the number of said car; was not certain of the make of said car; and that the only distinguishing feature of said car that she could recall was a loose, flapping top.

"On being questioned by John N. McIntosh, inspector of detectives, at 3.30 a. m., September 13, 1931, she was asked:

"Q. Do you think you could identify these men, Mrs. Massie?—
A. I don't know.

"In view of these statements of the complaining witness the

"In view of these statements of the complaining witness it is believed that the belief of the police that the accused were the perpetrators of the alleged crime was made obvious to her through the manner in which the accused were brought before her for the manner in which the accused were brought before her for identification, and that the ability of the complaining witness to subsequently identify four of the accused resulted from the suggestion contained in the method which was pursued.

"It can only be assumed that the reason the complaining witness did not give to the police authorities, immediately after the alleged offense was reported to them, the same details of information regarding her assailants that she was able to furnish by her testimony at the trial is because she did not possess it at that time, and it is entirely within reason to believe that her knowledge of the appearance, dress, and other identifying marks of the accused, as testified to by her at the trial, was acquired by events which occurred in the interim.

"(b) The circumstances of the rape upon the complaining witness, as related by her, would indicate that some positive traces of the violence used by the persons assaulting her would be left upon her person and her wearing apparel.

"An examination of the complaining witness made shortly after the alleged rape disclosed no evidence of sexual intercourse or marks of violence around her private parts, and a microscopic examination of her clothing disclosed no evidence of blood stains or seminal fluid upon those articles of her clothing which would come in contact with her genitalia or be disturbed by an assault upon her. Certain stains resembling blood were found on her upper outer garments, but the testimony shows that the complaining witness was bleeding from the mouth and these stains could have resulted from that source. The complaining witness at the time of the alleged assault upon her was wearing a green evening gown of frail material and evening slippers. Yet a careful examination of this dress and other articles of apparel worn by her failed to show any evidence of an attack such as she described, the garments being in perfect condition, neither rumpled nor torn, except one stocking, and the slippers showed no signs of the wearer having been dragged to the place of assault as testified to by her by her.

(c) Since the former trial of this case, exhaustive investigations that been made by the office of the attorney general of the Territory of Hawaii, the office of the public prosecutor of the city and county of Honolulu, and the Pinkerton National Detective Agency (Inc.), of New York City. Every known fact and circumstances of the case have been reviewed and no effort has been spared to of the case have been reviewed and no effort has been spared to secure evidence additional to that presented at the former trial which would tend to strengthen the case of the prosecution, particularly with reference to the two foregoing matters and which would also aid the prosecution in overcoming the alibi presented by the defendants. All of these investigations embraced a careful examination and analysis of the alibi of the defendants presented at said trial, and they have falled to discover any circumstances disproving or tending to disprove any portion of the statements made by the defendants immediately upon their arrest, their examination by the police, and the testimony of the witnesses called on their behalf at the trial. The movements and whereabouts of the defendants on the night of the alleged assault remain precisely as they were originally accounted for by them.

"The evidence adduced at the trial of said defendants was such that it is not surprising that a verdict of conviction was not obtained, and, in view of the fact that the above-mentioned investigations uncovered no new or additional evidence, there certainly is no more likelihood that a conviction could be obtained on a retrial of the case.

"Respectfully submitted this 13th day of February, A. D. 1933.

"Territory of Hawaii.

"By S. John C. Kelley,

"Public Prosecutor of the City and County of Honolulu."

I would request that this letter be made a part of the record of the special committee which was appointed for the purpose of inquiring into the recent crime committed in Hawaii and whose report was referred to the House on January 14, 1932, as found on page 1941. Very sincerely yours,

V. S. K. Houston, Delegate in Congress from Hawaii.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, membership on the same committee of the House over a period of years gives one an opportunity to value and appreciate the ability and the services of its Members in a way perhaps as nothing else can do. It likewise develops close friendships which are hard to give up.

Earlier in the afternoon, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Byrns], the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, spoke of the loss which the Committee on Appropriations was sustaining at the end of this Congress because of the retirement of so many of the Members of that committee. More recently, the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] touched upon the same subject. That committee, consisting of 35 members, loses 14 of its members at the close of this Congress.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. PARKER], the ranking Republican member on the Committee of Interstate and Foreign Commerce, earlier in the afternoon called attention to the losses of that committee. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce is not as large as the Committee on Appropriations. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has 23 members instead of 35, but it loses at the close of this Congress, 9 of its most able members, about the same percentage of loss as that sustained by the Committee on Appropriations.

The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce is one of the big working committees of the House. It has among its members some of the ablest and best Members of the House. This committee in the next Congress will be deprived of the benefit of the services and help of many of its strongest members, some of whom have been in Congress for a great many years.

I do not need to extol their virtues. I need only to call the roll of those who are now on the committee who will not be in the next Congress to bring forcibly to the attention of every Member of the House a realization of the loss which the committee and the House will suffer by the termination of their services here.

In order of their assignment to the committee, as well as their length of service in the House, they are: Homer Hoch, of Kansas, Republican; Adam M. Wyant, of Pennsylvania, Republican; Olger B. Burtness, of North Dakota, Republican; John E. Nelson, of Maine, Republican; Thomas J. B. Robinson, of Iowa, Republican; Milton C. Garber, of Oklahome, Republican; Augustine Lonergan, of Connecticut, Democrat, who goes to the Senate; James T. Igoe, of Illinois, Democrat; and Courtland C. Gillen, of Indiana, Democrat.

It will be hard to fill the places of these gentlemen. I do not want this occasion to pass without paying my respects to them, many of whom I have served with on the committee for a great many years, and for whom I have the greatest respect and admiration. I take this opportunity to extend, and I am sure the membership of the House, as well as the membership of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, will join me in extending, to them and theirs, sincere best wishes for their future prosperity and happiness. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. O'CONNOR). The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. McKeown] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Speaker, I am not able to prepare any speech on this occasion. Individually, I want to say that I lose as many friends on the Republican side of the House as any man in Congress. One of the things I regret is that not only will I lose friends, but I will lose my audience on that side of the House.

We who have served on the great Committee on the Judiciary are going to lose from our midst men like Leonidas Dyer, of St. Louis, a great lawyer; Mr. Christopherson, of South Dakota, who has been one of its most useful memmers; Governor Yates, of Illinois, whom we all love; and then we will have to lose EARL MICHENER, of Michigan-and I want to pause long enough to say there has been no abler man on the Judiciary Committee in this House or any other House than the gentleman from Michigan. We lose Mr. ELLIS MOORE, who is a scholar, a man of refinement, and who will be greatly missed. Then, we lose that indomitable man from New York, Mr. LaGuardia; and I want to say that Mr. LaGuardia is a living example to the youth of the country, a man springing from the loins of labor, entered the Congress of the United States. He is an untiring worker. Vigilant, vigorous, and progressive in his action and votes in the House, and conscientious in his thoughts and deeds, he is one of the hardest workers, and will be one of the men most missed in this House. Then, there is Homer Hall, of Illinois, a splendid man, courteous, and is a man who is practicable; also, CARL BACHMANN, of West Virginia. He is a fine character. Everybody loves Carl Bachmann. We like him for his fine character and we are going to miss him.

Then, we have Judge Sparks, from Kansas. Of course, he is a good lawyer and able man. He is a fellow who talks right out from the heart.

On our side we lose the Hon. Fred Dominick, former assistant attorney general of South Carolina, one of the great lawyers of that State. We lose his services on that committee. The State of Oklahoma is going to lose a man from the Republican side of the House, a very fine lawyer, a very fine Member of this House, a man who votes his conscientious judgment on all questions. I refer to the Hon. Milton C. Garber, of Oklahoma.

Mr. Speaker, let me say to the Membership of the House in the same on the part of private persons prior to its actual before I close that they each hold one of the most responsible positions in the gift of the American people. The writers of the Constitution so made it that they could never be appointed to office. They are elected by the people as representatives of the people of this country. Their task is a hard one, and in all this great crisis I hope that the Members of this House will hold their equilibrium and always remember that America is sound financially. America is sound in every way. You want to act on this knowledge. America is sound in thought; America is sound in energy, industry, and brains, and it is but a short time until America will emerge from this crisis, because as long as such men as the gentleman from New York, Mr. LaGuardia, can come to Congress, this country is safe. Thousands, yes, ten thousands of bright American boys can stop complaining of their lot and turn to the example of the gentleman from New York [Major LaGuardia] and there learn from his life that any youth in this Republic may rise to eminence in the Congress of the United States of America. I wish you and each of you Godspeed on your way, and may you chart your course in life by the polar star of truth, honor, and integrity to district, State, and Nation.

PERMANENT APPROPRIATIONS—EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, as chairman of a special committee of the Appropriations Committee on permanent appropriations, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the work of the committee to date

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. O'CONNOR). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York? There was no objection.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, as chairman of the special committee on permanent appropriations of the Appropriations Committee, I desire to put in the Record at this time a summary of the problems confronting our committee and to explain the reasons why the committee has been unable to complete its work.

The fact is that the committee, consisting of Messrs. Wright, Hastings, Ludlow, Hart, French, Murphy, Taber, and myself, were appointed rather late in the session. All of us were tied up in our respective subcommittees and were not able to get together for regular meetings until the current appropriation bills were well through conference.

The permanent appropriations are of two classes—the permanent indefinites and the permanent specifics.

The former consist of those appropriations for purposes for which the specific amount required can not be accurately computed in advance, as, for example, the interest on the public debt. The amount of the latter is constantly fluctuating; consequently, the permanent appropriation for the payment of the interest thereon is couched in terms which are indefinite as to the amount but which appropriate such amounts as may be necessary.

The permanent specific appropriations are those for a definite and specified amount of money for the object of which the appropriation is being made, as, for example, the permanent appropriation of $3,000,000 per annum for the meat-inspection service under the Department of Agriculture.

The permanent appropriations are also susceptible of another classification, based on the character of the funds from which the appropriations are made. These funds fall into two main classes, namely, Federal funds and non-Federal funds. All appropriations of moneys which belong to the Federal Government are grouped in the first class. They consist of such appropriations as those for the retirement of and payment of interest on the public debt, for cooperative agricultural extension work, payments to certain States of the authorized percentage of receipts from the sale or lease of portions of the public domain, and appropriations of a like character, where the money actually belongs to the Government and there is no equitable interest in the same on the part of private persons prior to its actual appropriation, as distinguished from funds which are in the nature of trust funds, such as the interest on gifts or bequests made for a specific purpose, insurance or retirement funds made up of contributions by or assessments upon individuals, the repayment or refunding to individuals of amounts paid or deposited by them in excess of the amounts subsequently found to be requisite for the purposes for which such payment or deposits were made, and so forth.

The following tabulation shows the total permanent annual appropriations in the current bills:

Estimated permanent annual appropriations, fiscal year 1934 Grand total (table No. 3, 1934 Budget, p. A162) __ $1,399,336,521 Exceptions made to repeal by section 16, Senate amendment 14, Treasury-Post Office appropria-

Practically this balance of over $49,000,000 is all that is susceptible of being taken out of the permanent class.

OBJECTIVE OF THIS RESEARCH

The chief objective of our researches and studies is, of course, to try to effect national economies. Many of these permanent specific appropriations were provided for many years ago to meet certain conditions then existing, but which, in the course of time, have been completely altered. Nevertheless, these provisions of the law being mandatory, the appropriations are automatically allotted, without review or examination by the Appropriations Committee or any supervision as to the manner or the care with which they have been expended.

Whether or not there has been any waste can not be estimated or even guessed, but one thing is certain, that the pressure of the dead hand of past Congresses keeps open the door of the Treasury to unsupervised and unregulated expenditures.

It will be noticed that Federal funds and non-Federal funds from which permanent appropriations are made are susceptible of the following breakdown:

- A. Federal funds:
 - General fund in the Treasury.
 - 2. Special funds in the Treasury.
- B. Non-Federal funds:
 - 1. Trust funds.
 - 2. Assessments, contributions, fines, etc.
 - 3. Refund of excess of deposits or payments.
 - 4. Other funds of trust character.

A complete statement of the permanent appropriations is to be found in the following summary:

PERMANENT ANNUAL APPROPRIATIONS—SPECIFIC AND INDEFINITE [COMPILER'S NOTE.—The text and amounts of the permanent annual appropriations are taken from the Budget for the fiscal year 1933, as modified by subsection (b) of section 318 of the year 1933, as incumed by subsection (b) of section 318 of the economy act, reducing funds for vocational education, omitting from this list those items under which no appropriations are estimated for the fiscal year 1933. The sums under the indefinite permanent appropriations are estimated and are subject to revision as the fiscal year progresses and better data become available.]

Cooperative agricultural extension work—

For the purpose of paying the expenses of cooperative agricultural extension work and the necessary printing and distributing of information in connection with same, there is permanently appropriated $480,000 for each year, $10,000 of which is paid annually to each State which has by action of its legislature assented to the provisions of the act. There was also appropriated an additional sum of $600,000 for the fiscal year following that in which the foregoing appropriations first became available, and for each year thereafter for 7 years a sum exceeding by $500,000 the sum appropriated for each preceding year, and for each year thereafter there is permanently appropriated the sum of $4,100,000 in addition to the sum of $480,000. The additional sums are allotted annually to each State by the Secretary of Agriculture and paid in the proportion which the rural population of each State bears to the total rural population of all the States as determined by the next preceding Federal census, but no payment out of the additional appropriations can be made in any year to any State until an equal sum has been appropriated for that year by the legislature of such State, or provided by State, county, college, local authority, or individual contributions from within the State, for the maintenance of cooperative agricultural extension work. On May 16, 1928, this appropriation was amended to include agricultural extension work. On May 16, 1928, this appropriation was amended to include a permanent allotment to the Territory of a permanent allotment to the Territory of Hawaii of $10,000 plus an additional sum of $12,935.43, subject to the same terms and conditions as the original act. The permanent annual appropriation was thereby increased to $4,602,935.43 (U. S. C., title 7, secs. 342, 343; U. S. C., Supp. V, title 7, secs. 386–386b)

Total permanent and indefinite appropriations_ 1, 285, 191, 028

The foregoing list of the permanent appropriations contains only those appropriations which are active and involve disbursements during the current fiscal year. There are doubtless numerous other permanent appropriations which are dormant at the present time and some of which may have already run their course so that expenditures will not recur under them.

Since its appointment the subcommittee has held several meetings and has made substantial progress in the study of the character of the permanent appropriations with a view of determining which of them should be converted to an annual appropriation status for inclusion in the regular annual appropriation bills.

Believing that no action should be recommended without first giving the heads of the various departments opportunity to be heard on the question of the repeal of the permanent appropriations coming within their respective purviews, the committee has advised each of them respecting its investigations and has requested them to be prepared to appear, when the committee shall have resumed its work in the forthcoming extra session of the Congress, to show cause, if any, why the permanent appropriations over which they have jurisdiction should not be repealed or converted to the status of regular annual appropriations, so as to be annually subject to examination and review.

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection. 450,000

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Speaker, 12 years ago I came to the House of Representatives, and I think the first word I ever spoke upon the floor was a word in behalf of farm people, for whom and with whom I had been working all my life.

To-morrow with the sound of the gavel in the South [laughter] I shall have completed 12 years of service, and nothing finer could happen to me than to have the last word that I shall be privileged to say to the membership of the House spoken in behalf of this same splendid group.

So, Mr. Speaker, in these last minutes I express the hope and the wish that even in the closing hours of the session by some form of parliamentary procedure we may be given the opportunity of voting for one more piece of legislation that I believe will bring hope and comfort and renewed confidence to millions of men upon the farms and in the small homes of the United States of America. I sincerely hope and I plead with the majority, which is charged with the responsibility, that we may be given the opportunity to cast our vote upon the so-called Hull-Walcott bill, which will provide temporary mortgage relief to this vast group of farm and city people until permanent legislation can be devised and passed in the special session of Congress. I believe this will bring relief, satisfaction, and reassurance to the farmers, with whom I have been so delightfully associated during all these years.

Now, Mr. Speaker, may I say just one additional word, and that is a word of appreciation for all the kindnesses that have been extended to me individually since I came here 12 years ago.

According to the calendar and Doctor Osler I am now an old man. [Laughter.] I have attained, if you will pardon the personal reference, the ripe old age of 60 years. From this vantage ground of experience may I just tender this little word of farewell and good-by.

I want to say to you, friends, that I do not go away from this Chamber with overwhelming regret; in fact, I do not know that I have stated to you the real reason I go away. It is simply because my constituents, from whom I have been absent for 12 years, could stand it no longer without my presence, and, consequently, on November 8 they extended a cordial invitation that I return and associate with them. [Laughter.] So I am going back, not consumed with regrets but with every recollection of satisfaction and pleasure, as I shall remember the delightful associations that have come to me during the last 12 years. In view of the tremendous problems that are ahead of you in the days to come, may I leave just this one little sentiment that came to us out of the war times, but which has unusual application for the day and generation in which we live. Some finely inspired young man during the days of the war penned this

In that spirit of unity and devotion to the highest and best, I challenge you to carry on.

Good-bye and good luck to you all. [Applause.]

ORDER OF BUSINESS

The SPEAKER. The Chair wants to explain to the Members who have come into the Chamber in response to the bells that the Chair took the privilege of having the bells rung on account of the fact that many Members had left the Chamber under the impression that probably no matters of importance would come up during the balance of this session. The Chair found there was pending a conference report from the Banking and Currency Committee; and also a Senate resolution dealing with the banking situation in the District of Columbia, and therefore had the bells run so that the Members could be present.

CONDUCT OF BANKING BUSINESS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate joint resolution (S. J. Res. 261), authorizing the Comptroller of the Currency to prescribe regulations respecting the conduct of banking business in the District of Columbia, and consider the same.

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Speaker, I object to such unanimousconsent procedure.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the Senate joint resolution (S. J. Res. 261) authorizing the Comptroller of the Currency to prescribe regulations respecting the conduct of banking business in the District of Columbia.

The Clerk read the Senate joint resolution, as follows:

Senate Joint Resolution 261

Resolved, etc., That, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Comptroller of the Currency, whenever he is of the opinion that such action is necessary for the protection of the interests of depositors and other creditors of any incorporated bank and/or trust company doing business in the District of Columbia, and that such action is in the public interest, is hereby authorized and empowered to prescribe such rules and regulations as he deems advisable governing the receipt and withdrawal of deposits by and from any such bank and trust company, which rules and regulations shall be binding upon said banks and trust companies.

That it shall be lawful for any incorporated bank and trust com-

That it shall be lawful for any incorporated bank and trust company in said District to comply with such rules and regulations promulgated by the Comptroller of the Currency.

Nothing herein shall be construed to impair any power otherwise possessed by the Comptroller of the Currency, the Secretary of the Treasury, or the Federal Reserve Board.

Treasury, or the Federal Reserve Board.

That all powers herein conferred shall terminate six months from the approval of this joint resolution by the President of the United States, but he may extend the force of the provisions hereof by proclamation for an additional six months.

This resolution is hereby declared to be an emergency law, necessary for the immediate preservation of the public peace, health, and extern

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. BUSBY. I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. BUSBY. I am.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized for 20 minutes, the gentleman from Mississippi for 20 minutes.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I do not consider the present hour a time for speech making, so I do not expect to speak at length. Members of this House are informed of conditions that exist throughout the United States and in the District of Columbia, and I feel sure that Members recognize the purposes and the necessity for the passage of the resolution under consideration.

The resolution conveys the least of authority that has been conferred upon banking authorities in any legislation offered dealing with the difficulties with which the banks of the Nation are involved. The only power bestowed by this resolution is to regulate the acceptance and withdrawal of deposits in the District of Columbia. No further power of any kind is bestowed.

Adjoining States have passed appropriate legislation conferring unusual powers upon the banking authorities and officials of those States.

In the District of Columbia we are advised that some of the banks have inaugurated a rule of partial payments of deposits, so that other banks that have not seen fit to adopt the same rule of limited payments are at a disadvantage and in danger of undergoing further difficulties.

Not only is that true, but I think all will agree that it is wise and appropriate that the public who deposit their funds in banks are entitled to the protection that can come alone in the existing situation from the exercise of fullest authority on the part of banking officials.

This resolution confers the minimum of power that will adequately equip the office of the Comptroller of the Currency with the necessary authority to control the situation.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. STEAGALL. I yield.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. I understand this legislation, as the gentleman points out, will permit restrictions on the withdrawals of deposits. I submit to the gentleman that if there is to be a restoration of confidence we ought to pass the bank deposit guarantee law, the Steagall bill as it passed the House. I think that all the parliamentary tactics ought to be invoked to get that bill out of the other body and passed in the next few hours. [Applause.]

Mr. STEAGALL. I will say to the gentleman from New York, who is a useful Member of this body, and a Member whose opinion is valued highly by the membership of the House and by the people of the United States, that I appreciate the indorsement of the gentleman of the legislation that I had the honor to introduce, and which was passed last year. [Applause.]

In reply to the gentleman, I will say that the chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee of the House, the author of this bill, and the committee have exercised fully and fairly the powers intrusted with respect to banking legislation to persuade the Senate to consider that measure. We have not forgotten our duty to this House to see to it that legislation passed in this body by an overwhelming vote and sent to the other body should receive consideration in that body. The bill to which the gentleman refers received an overwhelming majority in the House, and the American people have plead and prayed for its passage for the last eight months.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. The plain fact is that propagandists have been so busy in the unfair campaign of criticism against the membership of this House, that they have led a great many people into the false impression that the House is negligent in this hour of distress, and many even believe that the bank deposit protection bill is still pending in this House without action. If legislation of this type, demanded as it is by the American people, the demand no longer limited to small communities and small banks, but by bankers of every type in the United States-I say if the legislation had been sent to this body from the Senate, I wonder what we would have read in the press of the country if we had, for eight months, refused under like circumstances to give it consideration. I yield now to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. WILLIAMSON].

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I concur with the gentleman that a resolution of this character should be passed, but I have a fear that this may be used as an excuse for permitting banks which may have in fact become insolvent to operate. I think it should be made certain that this will not be made an excuse for permitting banks that have become insolvent to still continue open.

Mr. STEAGALL. The policy has been, in cases of the kind to which the gentleman refers, to take possession of the assets of the bank and preserve them for the protection of creditors. It is expected that the Comptroller of the Currency, if he acts in such case in the District of Columbia, will pursue the same policy of segregating the assets and dealing with each situation in an intelligent and constructive way, so as to preserve the assets and protect the interests of existing as well as prospective depositors.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. Yes.

Mr. MAY. I am receiving numerous telegrams from constituents all over my district, and from people all over the State, demanding the passage of a bank deposit guaranty bill, and they have mentioned the Steagall bill and asked if it has been passed. I have told them that it is still pending in the Senate. What does the gentleman think would have been the result if that bill had been agreed to by the Senate last June, when it was passed by the House?

Mr. STEAGALL. The gentleman understands what my views are in that matter. If I had to base my answer solely upon my judgment in the matter, I might hesitate to say what would have been the result of the legislation. But the thousands of telegrams and letters that have poured into my office from the day that bill was first taken up in this House, followed as those letters and telegrams are now by demands coming from the high centers of finance and from big bankers and financial leaders, reinforced by that judgment and that demand, I think without immodesty I might say that I believe now, as I have believed for 10 years during the time that I have waged this battle in this House and in the committee for bank deposit protection legislation, that such a measure would have saved us from the horrible conditions that exist to-day. A bill embodying the principle of insurance to bank deposits in the United States would have restored confidence in the United States, and the restoration of confidence would have cured the greater portion of our troubles.

It would have taken out of hoarding a billion and a half dollars now buried and hidden in the pockets and private vaults of the people; it would have taken out of the postalsavings banks of this country another billion dollars that is there idle and in hoarding. I say this because under the law the deposits in postal-savings banks can not be used in trade and commerce without substituting liquid securities, which are the same as cash. It would have permitted the banks to cease their policy of hoarding and use their bank deposits as the basis for bank credit. This the banks can not do under existing law. The use of bank credit is indispensable to trade and commerce and to the revival of business in the United States. It is indispensable to the maintenance of Government credit. It is necessary in the financing program outlined by the Government for the coming months of the new administration. Boiled down, our greatest need is the restoration of confidence. The one way to accomplish that without dangerous delay is through adequate legislation to insure bank deposits. [Applause.]

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. STEAGALL. I am sorry, but I have not the time. I reserve the remainder of my time for other members of the committee.

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, our chairman opened his talk by saying that this is no time for speech making. I am one of the Members of the House who do not believe that any good purpose can ever be served by refusing to discuss the reasons that impel us to enact legislation which applies to the people of the country. I think that a full discussion of the motives that drive us to consider and enact laws that apply to the people ought to be laid open before the people, so that they can see the reason for the hope we entertain concerning the legislation.

We passed a similar bill to this one for the District of Columbia a few days ago to apply to the rest of the country. I opposed that bill, but because of the situation and circumstances I was prevented from having more than a very short time in which to express myself. Many of you Members of the House are not listening now, many of you are carrying on private conversations now in the House Chamber, and that is your business. You are paying no attention to what I say, and that is more of your business. I am sorry that two years ago, when I and others began discussing this subject, trying to point out in an ineffective way the financial trend this country was taking, that we had these same private conversations and indifference toward the things that Members who study the subject had to say. I am sorry that this calamity has had to come upon you like an avalanche to get you to understand that there was something important that a few of us Members were trying to get an opportunity to discuss on the floor of this

It is unnecessary for me to enumerate the types of legislation that have consumed our time; the time of the Congress. We believe that this matter of dealing with banks and the currency situation should be attended to while the time was yet before us. We asked for opportunities to discuss the matter with you, but were denied the time to plead for legislation to save the situation for the people.

Now, coming more directly to the subject, we are trying to save the bank situation in this country. I told you this a year ago: Our bank situation is founded on a condition that is inherent failure in the set-up. Our banking system never has worked and it never will work except for short periods of time of five or six years. Why? They say, " have no bank failures in France." That is true. But France has twice as much coined and issued currency as it has bank credits, and there is not much chance for a bank to fail where you have $2 to pay every dollar of deposits with. Our country has a bank structure where the base is very narrow. We have $5,500,000,000 of currency and $45,000,000,000 of bank credits. In other words, the banks have promised to pay the depositors $45,000,000,000 in cash, and there is not more than $5,000,000,000 in existence to pay that with. We have driven up to this situation where the banks have $16,000,000,000 of checking accounts and $24,000,000,000 of time deposits, and the 1st of January, 1933, the Federal Reserve Bulletin said the banks had $700,000,000 in cash with which to pay $45,000,000,000.

During the last 20 days the people have gone to the banks and have taken out $400,000,000 of that $700,000,000. True, the Treasury has replaced some of it, but the banks owe, for every dollar that they can muster to pay depositors with, $50 to those depositors. You can not make a system like that work. What I say has got nothing to do with runs on the banks or the conditions here. Already banks are closed from one end of the country to the other-in 28 States. Let me call your attention to this. Some say, "Are you for artificial inflation?" I tell you our banking set-up is an artificial arrangement. It is nothing handed down from God. It is not like the Ark of the Covenant that is holy and sacred and unapproachable. It is an artificial set-up, and one we have had sad experience with from time to time. In the 149 years of our national existence we have spent 40 years in panics, and before the common people get out of one panic they are catapulted into another by the arrangement we are trying to operate under.

Why will not our system work? Simply because the banks are natural inflationists. Do you understand that? You can be against inflation all you want to, but the banks are natural inflationists. When we have business going along on a level trend, people go and they apply to their banker to borrow money. The banker says, "All right; what have you to secure it with?" The borrower says, "I have my farm." "All right. Give me a trust deed for $1,000 and I will loan you the money."

Mr. DISNEY. Mr. Speaker, it is impossible to hear.

Mr. BUSBY. They will hear the crash of those banks whether they hear me or not. Let the Members talk. It is on you, and there is nothing under the sun that can prevent it. You can not remain on the gold standard, as much as you have worshiped the golden calf. People are lined up at the Treasury to-day-and have been for four days-taking gold out of the Treasury as fast as they can get to the window to do it, and the newspapers have not said anything about it. It will take you almost an hour, standing in line, to get to the gold window and convert your Federal reserve notes into gold right now, and the only thing that will save gold is for a proclamation to come from the White House abandoning the gold standard. [Applause.] Now, let us go along. The banks issue this credit, and the people take check books. They write checks against those credits. They imagine that when they borrow and get credit on a bank book that that is cash. That is not cash and never was cash. It is credit extended. No cash has been brought into the bank, and if everybody who has credit in the bank tries to take the cash out, of course, the banks collapse: because the bank has agreed to pay the person $1,000, and the bank has agreed to wait until next fall or next year, when the note matures, for the return of that $1,000. So you can take care of your situation both ways. You can take your cash out of the bank, and the bank must wait until next fall to get its cash; and when the note matures and you bring the cash back, in the meantime, the bank has had the opportunity of going broke.

I name the gentlemen who are responsible for this condition. We have had Mr. Ogden Mills, the Secretary of the Treasury, before the Committee on Banking and Currency. We have had Mr. Eugene Meyer, the president of the Federal Reserve Board, before the Committee on Banking and Currency. They are wholly out of line and out of sympathy with anything that would have brought relief to this situation and to the suffering people of this country, and it is on their heads that the trouble lies. I tell you it is impossible to set up any banking system or issue currency and put it into circulation and make it work successfully if you have not got a friendly Secretary of the Treasury and a friendly Federal Reserve Board to cooperate with you. It just will not work, and the result is that they can thwart any effort you put forth by legislation to bring relief to the people. How? By squeezing this currency out of circulation. How did they do it in 1920? They simply changed the rediscount rules of the Federal reserve banks. They refused to even renew the loans of member banks on Liberty bonds in order to make the banks pay up their loans, so that they could make their depositors pay up. Thereby they withdrew in 20 months in 1920-21, $1,815,000,000 cash from circulation. That caused the crash and panic

Suppose you pay the soldiers' bonus; suppose you send the money out to the soldiers to the extent of $2,200,000,000. How long would it take an unfriendly Federal Reserve Board, an unfriendly Secretary of the Treasury, to milk that $2,200,000,000 out of circulation? I venture to tell you it would not take more than about 15 months to do it just as effectively as they did in 1920.

No; I do not think it does any good for us to slip legislation through here and refuse to discuss it or give the people our reasons for the legislation. I do not think it does any good for us to do like the proverbial ostrich that digs a hole and puts his head in the sand when he sees the cyclone coming, hoping thereby to avoid destruction by the cyclone because he has buried his head in the sand and can not see it coming. No more can we relieve impending troubles and oncoming situations that destroy the people and the financial fabric of this country by such tactics as that of the famed ostrich. We should see. We should keep our eyes open and reason among ourselves about what is best to do.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman vield?

Mr. BUSBY. I vield.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Even conceding the correctness of now is such that some sort of legislation must be passed in order to take care of the bank situation?

Mr. BUSBY. I shall be glad to refer to that.

Now, these people who have worked and got money, who have taken their money and put it in the bank have a right, under contract with the bank, to take that money out of the bank. The bank has told them they could, and that is a contract as sacred as any other contract.

By this legislation you are setting up a scheme which provides that bayonets, if need be, can be put between those people and their money and they be driven away from it regardless of the contract that has been entered into with them by the bank. I am not for any such system of legalized robbery, because it is not right.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. I yield.

Mr. PARSONS. Does the gentleman believe this is constitutional?

Mr. BUSBY. I do not believe that States can pass laws impairing the obligations of contract, and the proponents admit that this bill is extremely weak from a constitutional standpoint; but they say it works. It reminds me of the story of the man who was in jail. His lawyer after examining the facts, said: "Why, they can't put you in jail for this." He said, "Yes; but I am in jail, and what I want is to get out." And so with this, men tell you that we can not do it, but the banks are doing it and the result is that no individual can get court action in time to save himself from the situation.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman vield?

Mr. BUSBY. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The press informs us that this morning banks are closed in 28 States. I am in sympathy with a great deal of what the gentleman has said, but does he not also think that, if the other body had followed the example set by the House and passed the bank guaranty bill, this situation might have been averted?

Mr. BUSBY. That would have been so probably at that time, but let me state why that bank guaranty bill would not work at this time. The banks owe the depositors $45,000,000,000. They owe them that much, and they have got to pay all that in coined and issued currency on demand. They have to pass money-legal tender-out in payment. Now, the banks incurred that debt when commodities and properties were at a high level. They agreed to make those payments back some years ago; and on down to the present time in relation to commodity values they made loans on lands and other property when those properties were high, but values have gone down until they can not sell the property and securities in the open market and get the funds with which to meet the demands made on them.

Now, if we undertake to guarantee $45,000,000,000 of deposits, with the situation going as it is to-day, there will be an overwhelming demand made upon the credit of this country to raise funds to make good this bank credit.

It is true that the banks have loaned about $35,000,000,000. and they might be able to use that to offset some of the demands; but much of that is not due yet, and the bank could not demand it until it is due, but the depositors can withdraw their money because there is an agreement between them and the bank that they may withdraw it.

Mr. BLACK. Does not the gentleman think the right way to restore the confidence of the public in the Government and the banks is for the executive branch of the Government to go after the big bank thieves, imprison them as quickly as possible, and stop this nonsense and picayune legislative methods of trying to protect the people?

Mr. BUSBY. That would help the situation, and I recommend that procedure.

Now, in closing, I want to say that this legislation is recommended to-day by leading business men of the country. Immediate action before the adjournment of the present Congress is required. On the basis of its studies the directing committee recommends for your earnest considerathe gentleman's premise, does he not think the situation here | tion the following steps to meet this emergency. First, that a banking bill be immediately passed with an amendment! providing an adequate Federal guaranty of the deposits of all existing banks upon application and for a limited time. Second, an immediate embargo of gold export and suspension of specie payments to prevent hoarding and foreign withdrawal. Third, the only condition on which the Government can assume the risk of guaranteeing bank deposits is as part of a definite program to raise the whole level of commodity prices. It must, therefore, at the earliest possible date after the new Congress convenes, pass the necessary sound monetary and credit legislation to raise and stabilize the general level of commodity prices. The committee's studies indicate that if the export of gold is embargoed, specie payments stopped, as steps in the program of such monetary legislation, there will follow a major upturn in commodity prices, immediate restoration of confidence, a revival of business activity, and steadily increasing employment.

This is where the trouble lies. The commodities and the properties of the people of this country have been beaten down and beaten down by lack of circulating medium and by the hiding out and the hoarding of currency until there is no machinery with which to do business.

Let us get together, and if we have to deal with an already wrecked situation, let us build up on a firmer basis and take care of the masses of the people along with the Wall Street thieves, and we shall have done the country a great service. [Applause.]

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. Yes.

Mr. RICH. If we issued $45,000,000,000 of scrip, does the gentleman think the people would want to take that out of the banks?

Mr. BUSBY. I would rather not go into that proposition now. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFadden].

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman two additional minutes.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest to what has been said in regard to this particular bill. This bill would not have been before you if it had been included, as it should have been, in the bill that was passed in the early part of this week, giving the right to the national banks of the various States to do the thing provided for in this bill.

It is a serious matter to grant authority to freeze the assets of the banks of this whole country to an officer of the Government, but we now know that under the operation of a similar measure 28 States have been given this authority, either under authority granted by the States or under the authority which we have granted to the Comptroller of the Currency to freeze the assets of national banks, and I can see no reason now that the several States have been given this authority why the District of Columbia should be prohibited from receiving the benefits, if any, of this particular legislation.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON].

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, I have appeared before you a great many times on matters coming from the Committee on Banking and Currency. I regret exceedingly that this, probably my last appearance on this floor, is to advocate the passage of as revolutionary a measure and as radical a proposition as the one which were now advocating, and yet it is the proper thing to do, in my judgment.

I shall not engage in a discussion as to why we are in the difficulties and why the country is confronted with the crisis with which it is now faced, this is a matter which it is useless to discuss at this hour, because it is too late in this Congress to make any correction of it; but suffice it to say that we have in the banks of this country $42,000,000,000 of deposits. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Busby] stated $16,000,000,000 in checking and $24,000,000,000 in time deposits, making $40,000,000,000, but the report I get is $42,000,000,000, and the gentleman stated that there was owed by the banks $45,000,000,000 of deposits, but you will find it figures out around $42,000,000,000. We have about $6,000,000,000 in actual cash in the banks of this country, and, therefore, we have $1 for every $7 of deposits, and if every-body wants their deposits—and this is a situation that is developing now on account of a fear which is probably groundless, but absolutely uncheckable—it means you will close the doors of every bank in the United States if something is not done, and this is no time to argue the question of whether we are violating or preparing to violate the provisions of a contract.

If a man can get part of his deposit and conserve the assets of the bank by regulation and proper liquidation, it is much better than to do the only other thing that can be done which would be to close up the banks and then the assets would be sold at a very low price, and the depositors would wait in agony and in want for a year before they got anything.

This is the alternative, and so far as I am concerned, I stand for the proposition of a common-sense, businesslike way to attempt to fix it so that something can be saved out of this situation until such steps may be taken, as will be taken in the new Congress, in a very few days or weeks, to straighten out the situation which is now so tangled and which is the cause of profound fear in everybody in this country, from the highest to the lowest. So much for this.

I am for the resolution because the only thing to do is to conserve the banking interests and the financial interests and the property interests and the interests of the depositors of this country in this great Capital of ours. We have done this for the States. We should have done it for the District of Columbia, but when this matter was before our committee, I betray no confidence when I say that I asked the Secretary of the Treasury if it would not be well to include the District of Columbia or whether it was necessary to include the District of Columbia, and the answer was in the negative, that it was not necessary. We took orders from the Treasury in this matter, as the Banking and Currency Committee necessarily has to do from time to time, and reported the resolution just as they had prepared it. This is the reason the District of Columbia was not embraced in the measure.

I thank you for your patient attention and for the many acts of courtesy I have experienced at the hands of this House and the many evidences of consideration which you have given me in the 16 years I have served here, which have been the finest of my life. [Applause, the Members rising.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the resolution.

The question was taken; and two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the resolution was passed.

FURTHER MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A further message from the Senate by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills and a joint resolution of the House of the following titles:

S. 5701. An act to authorize the construction of certain bridges and to extend the times for commencing and/or completing the construction of other bridges over the navigable waters of the United States.

AMENDING THE FEDERAL FARM LOAN ACT

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill S. 5337, to amend the Federal farm loan act, as amended, to permit loans for additional purposes, to extend the powers of Federal land banks in the making of direct loans, to authorize, upon certain terms, the reamortization of loans by Federal and joint-stock land banks, and for other purposes, and I ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

The conference report is as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 5337) to amend the Federal farm loan act, as amended, to permit loans for additional purposes, to extend the powers of Federal land banks in the making of direct loans, to authorize upon certain terms the reamortization of loans by Federal and joint-stock land banks, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respect Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the House amendment insert the following: That section 7 of the Federal farm loan act, as amended (U.S.C., title 12, ch. 7, secs. 711-722), is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

Whenever it shall appear to the Federal Farm Loan Board that national farm-loan associations have not been formed in any locality in the continental United States, or that the farmers residing in the territory covered by the charter of a national farm-loan association are unable to apply to the Federal land bank of the district for loans on account of the inability of such association to indorse such loans, the Federal Farm Loan Board may, in its discretion, authorize said bank, at any time within five years after this paragraph takes effect, to make direct loans to borrowers secured by first mortgages on farm lands situated within any such locality or territory. Except as herein any mortgage, and to accept payment of such aggregate otherwise specifically provided, all provisions of this act applicable with respect to loans made through national farm-loan associations shall, in so far as practicable, apply with respect to such direct loans, and the Federal Farm Loan Board is authorized to make such rules and regulations as it may deem necessary with respect to such direct loans: Provided, That no such loan shall be made for more than $15,000. Each borrower who obtains a direct loan from a Federal land bank shall subscribe and pay for stock in such bank in the sum of $5 for each $100 or fraction thereof borrowed."

SEC. 2. Paragraph "Fourth" of section 12 of the Federal farm loan act, as amended (U.S.C., title 12, ch. 7, sec. 771), is amended to read as follows:

"Fourth. Such loans may be made for the following purposes and for no other:

"(a) To provide for the purchase of land for agricultural

"(b) To provide for the purchase of equipment, fertilizers, and livestock necessary for the proper and reasonable operation of the mortgaged farm; the term 'equipment' to be defined by the Federal Farm Loan Board.

"(c) To provide buildings and for the improvement of farm lands; the term 'improvement' to be defined by the Federal Farm Loan Board.

"(d) To liquidate indebtedness of the owner of the land mortgaged, incurred for agricultural purposes, or incurred prior to January 1, 1933.

"(e) To provide the owner of the land mortgaged with funds for general agricultural uses."

Sec. 3. Subparagraph (b) of paragraph "Fourth" of section 13 of the Federal farm loan act, as amended (U. S. C., title 12, ch. 7, sec. 781), is amended by adding at the end thereof a new sentence to read as follows: "Every such bank may carry real estate as an asset, for a period of not exceeding five years, at its normal value but not to exceed the amount of the bank's investment therein at the time of acquirement of such real estate."

SEC. 4. Section 13 of the Federal farm loan act, as amended (U. S. C., title 12, ch. 7, sec. 771), is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraphs:

"Eleventh. At any time within five years after the date this paragraph takes effect, any borrower who has obtained a loan from a Federal land bank may on application to such Federal land bank and upon approval of such application by the directors of the bank, postpone the payment of any unpaid installment or installments in the manner herein provided in this section. Such postponed payment shall be made by paying at the time each succeeding annual installment is due, one-tenth of the amount of the postponed payment, and, in the case of semiannual installments, by paying at the time each succeeding semiannual installment is due, one-twentieth of the postponed payment, until the amount of such postponed payment has been paid. In any case in which the number of remaining installments due on the mortgage is less than 10, in the case of annual installments, or less than 20, in the case of semiannual installments, the amount of the postponed payment shall be distributed proportionately over the remaining number of installment payments.

"Twelfth. For the period of five years after the date this paragraph takes effect, every borrower shall pay simple interest on extended payments at the same rate of interest as stipulated in the mortgage securing the loans as to payments not in default and by express covenant in his mortgage deed shall undertake to pay when due all taxes, liens, judgments, or assessments which may be lawfully assessed against the land mortgaged. Taxes, liens, judgments, or assessments not paid when due, and paid by the mortgagee, shall become a part of the mortgage debt and shall bear interest at the rate provided in the mortgage.

"Thirteenth. When in the judgment of the directors conditions justify it, and with the approval of the Federal Farm Loan Board, to reamortize, in whole or in part, the aggregate amount remaining unpaid under the terms of ber of annual or semiannual installments sufficient to cover the interest payable on the mortgage, and in addition thereto such amounts to be applied upon the principal as will extinguish the debt within an agreed period of not more than 40 years from the date of the reamortization; to deposit such mortgages with the farm-loan registrar as collateral security for farm-loan bonds at an amount not exceeding the principal of the original loan remaining unpaid at the date of such amortization; and with the approval of the Federal Farm Loan Board to charge the borrower an amount not to exceed the actual cost incurred in connection with such reamortization."

SEC. 5. (a) Paragraph "Second" of section 14 of the Federal farm-loan act, as amended (U. S. C., title 12, ch. 7, sec. 791), is amended to read as follows:

Second. To loan on first mortgage, except through national farm-loan associations as provided in section 7 and section 8 of this act, or through agents as provided in section 15, or direct borrowers as provided in section 7."

(b) Section 14 of the Federal farm-loan act, as amended, is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"Sixth. To accept as additional security for any loan to any borrower under this act, or any installment on any such loan, any security other than Federal land-bank stock or mortgages on farm real estate; and the transfer to any Federal land bank of any security if it may not be accepted by the bank under this paragraph shall be void: Provided, That any bank may accept an assignment of the landlord's rent to the amount of any taxes paid on such land by the bank, or any interest due."

SEC. 6. (a) The fourth paragraph of section 19 of the Federal farm loan act, as amended (U.S.C., title 12, ch. 7, sec.

854), is amended to read as follows:

"No mortgage shall be accepted by a farm-loan registrar from a land bank as part of an offering to securing farmloan bonds, either originally or by substitution, except first mortgages made subject to the conditions prescribed in sections 4, 7, 12, 15, and 16: Provided, That such registrar, when authorized and directed to do so by the Federal Farm Loan Board, shall accept or retain in his custody as collateral, if otherwise eligible under the provisions of such sections, any first mortgage in connection with which the land bank depositing the same has agreed to defer for a period of not more than 10 years the collection of the principal portion of maturing installments and to accept payment of the aggregate amount of such principal on an amortization plan by means of a fixed number of annual or semiannual installments sufficient to cover the interest payable thereon and in addition thereto such amounts to be applied on the principal after the expiration of the period of deferment as will extinguish the debt within an agreed period of not more than 40 years from the date of such agreement.'

(b) Section 19 of the Federal farm loan act, as amended (U. S. C., title 12, ch. 7, secs. 851-856), is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"Such farm-loan registrar shall also accept purchasemoney mortgages as collateral security in place of mortgages withdrawn. The banks shall have power to execute all necessary conveyances, transfers, and assignments to carry out this provision."

SEC. 7. The eleventh paragraph of section 21 of the Federal farm loan act, as amended (U. S. C., title 12, ch. 7, sec. 881), is amended by substituting in lieu thereof the following:

"When any Federal land bank shall desire to participate in a consolidated issue of farm-loan bonds it shall make application to the Federal Farm Loan Board for the approval on its behalf of such issue and tender to the registrar approved farm mortgages, or obligations of the United States Government, as security therefor, and no banks shall participate in such consolidated issue until such application has been approved by the Federal Farm Loan Board. Such approved farm mortgages or obligations of the United States Government shall be held by each farm-loan regis-amount on an amortization plan by means of a fixed num- | trar as collateral security for consolidated bonds, separate and apart from the mortgages and/or Government bonds held by him as collective security for the bonds previously issued or assumed individually by the Federal land bank of his district. Amortization and other payments on the principal of first mortgages held by a farm-loan registrar as collateral security for the issue of consolidated farmloan bonds shall constitute a trust fund in the hands of the Federal land bank receiving the same and shall be applied or employed in the manner provided in section 22 with respect to payments on principal of first mortgages held as collateral for farm-loan bonds of individual banks.

"Every Federal land bank shall notify the farm-loan registrar of the disposition of all payments made on the principal of mortgages held as collateral security for the issue of consolidated farm-loan bonds, and said registrar is authorized, at his discretion, to order any of such payments, or the proceeds thereof, wherever deposited or however invested, to be immediately transferred to his account as trustee aforesaid. Each bank shall maintain with the farmloan registrar of its district collateral security for the issue of consolidated farm-loan bonds in an amount at least equal to the face amount of such bonds issued on its behalf.

"When any Federal land bank shall surrender to the farm-loan registrar of its district any consolidated Federal farm-loan bonds, canceled or uncanceled, said land bank shall be entitled to withdraw first mortgages and bonds previously pledged as collateral in connection with any issue of consolidated farm-loan bonds to an amount equal to the consolidated farm-loan bonds so surrendered, and it shall be the duty of such registrar to permit and direct the delivery of such mortgages and bonds to such land bank.

"The Federal Farm Loan Board may at any time call upon any Federal land bank for additional security to protect the consolidated bonds issued under the provisions of this section. Each bank shall pay when due, without notice, all bonds and coupons issued on its behalf hereunder.

"Every Federal land bank shall have power to exchange consolidated farm-loan bonds for farm-loan bonds previously issued or assumed by it individually, with the approval of and under rules and regulations promulgated by the Federal Farm Loan Board."

SEC. 8. The balance of the $125,000,000 provided for the Federal land banks by the act of January 23, 1932, not heretofore used for the extension of loans or the making of new loans, shall be used by such banks for the extension of loans and the making of new loans as authorized by this act and the Federal farm loan act, as amended.

And the House agree to the same.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 5337) to amend the Federal farm loan act, as amended, to permit loans for additional purposes, to extend the powers of Federal land banks in the making of direct loans, to authorize upon certain terms the reamortization of loans by Federal and jointstock land banks, and for other purposes, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conferees and recommended in the accompanying conference report:

Section 1 of the Senate bill provided for direct loans by Federal land banks to farmers residing in localities where national farm loan associations have not been formed or where existing farm loan associations are unable to have their applications accepted by the Federal land banks. It | latter section provides specifically for extensions of payment. was contemplated that this provision should be a part of the permanent law. It was further provided that whenever there were 10 or more borrowers who had obtained such direct loans aggregating not less than $20,000 such borrowers would form a national farm loan association, if in the opinion of the Federal Farm Loan Board the locality in which such bororwers resided could be conveniently served by such an association.

Section 2 of the House amendment makes similar provision for direct loans to farmers by the Federal land banks, but without requiring the borrowers to form a national farmloan association. The time within which such loans may be made is also limited to five years from the date of enactment of the bill.

The conference agreement retains the language of section 2 of the House amendment.

Section 1 of the House amendment provides that for a period of not to exceed five years the payment of unpaid installments due the Federal land banks may be postponed, the amount of the postponed installments to be distributed over the remaining period that the loan has to run. There was no corresponding provision in the Senate bill. The conference agreement retains the language of section 1 of the House amendment.

Section 2 of the Senate bill extended the purposes for which loans might be made by the Federal land banks so as to provide that the borrower might liquidate indebtedness incurred prior to January 1, 1933, and might be provided with funds for general agricultural uses. There is no similar provision in the House amendment. The conference agreement retains section 2 of the Senate bill.

Section 3 of the Senate bill authorized the Federal land banks, with the approval of the Federal Farm Loan Board, to reamortize over a 40-year period the amounts due the banks under the terms of mortgages held by them. A similar provision is contained in section 5 of the House amendment. The conference agreement retains the language of the House

Section 4 of the Senate bill amended section 14 of the Federal Farm Loan Act, as amended, so as to provide that the restrictions imposed by that section should not apply to direct loans to borrowers authorized by section 1 of the Senate bill. There is no corresponding provision in the House amendment. The conference agreement retains the language of section 4 of the Senate bill.

Section 5 of the Senate bill provided that the farm-loan registrars, when authorized and directed to do so by the Federal Farm Loan Board, should accept as collateral first mortgages in connection with which the land banks had agreed to defer for a period of not more than five years the collection of the principal of maturing installments and to accept payment of such principal on an amortization plan covering a period of not more than 40 years. There is no corresponding provision in the House amendment. conference agreement retains this provision of the Senate bill with a slight change.

Section 6 of the Senate bill provided for participation by the Federal land banks in consolidated issues of farm-loan bonds under certain conditions set out in such section. There is no corresponding provision in the House amendment. The conference agreement retains the provision of the Senate bill.

Section 3 of the House amendment provides that for a period of five years borrowers from the Federal land banks whose payments have been extended shall pay interest on the extended payments at the same rate as they are required to pay with respect to payments not in default and that such borrowers shall undertake to pay when due all taxes, liens, judgments, or assessments which may be lawfully assessed against the land mortgaged. There was no corresponding provision in the Senate bill.

The conference agreement retains the substance of the House amendment, but transfers the provision from section 12 to section 13 of the Federal Farm Loan Act since the

Section 4 of the House amendment provides that the Federal land banks may carry real estate as an asset for a period of not exceeding five years in the amount of the banks' investment therein at the time of acquirement of such real estate. There was no corresponding provision in the Senate bill. The conference agreement retains the substance of the House amendment but provides that such real estate may be carried at its normal value but not to exceed the amount of the bank's investment therein.

Section 6 of the House amendment provides that no Federal land bank may accept as security, or as additional security for any loan, any security other than first mortgages on farm real estate or Federal land-bank stock, except an assignment of the landlord's rent to the amount of any taxes paid on the land by the bank, or any interest due. There was no corresponding provision in the Senate bill.

The conference agreement retains the provision of the House amendment with clarifying changes.

Section 7 of the House amendment provides that farmloan registrars shall accept as collateral security in place of mortgages withdrawn, purchase-money mortgages and contracts to sell acquired real estate for a period of not to exceed five years at the amount of the bank's investment therein. There was no similar provision in the Senate bill. The conference agreement limits this power of the farmloan registrars to the acceptance of purchase-money mortgages and removes the 5-year limitation.

Section 8 of the House amendment provides that the balance of the $125,000,000 provided in the act of January 23, 1932, for additional capital stock of the Federal land banks should be used by the Federal land banks in carrying out the provisions of the bill for extensions of loans or making new loans. There was no corresponding provision in the Senate bill. The conference agreement retains the House provision with clarifying changes.

> HENRY B. STEAGALL, W. F. STEVENSON, T. ALAN GOLDSBOROUGH, L. T. McFadden, JAMES G. STRONG, Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Alabama explain wherein the conference report differs from the bill as it passed the House?

Mr. STEAGALL. There is no substantial change in the legislation. The House struck out the Senate bill and inserted the House bill. The purpose was to incorporate in the final legislation one provision of the Senate bill which was to provide a plan for selling consolidated bonds to secure loans for each individual bank.

Heretofore, it has been the custom of banks to float separate bond issues for each bank. For some reason or other two of the banks have been paying a higher interest rate on bonds than the rate paid by the other 10 banks, notwithstanding the law provides that each bank is responsible for the bonds of every other bank. The Federal Farm Board and the officials of these banks believe that by issuing consolidated bonds they will get cheaper rates than may be obtained by individual banks.

Mr. STAFFORD. And they are going to rescue the two banks in distressed condition.

Mr. STEAGALL. They believe they can get an average rate that will be lower than any bank has obtained heretofore. Now, that is the only substantial change in the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. They believe that the support of 12 banks is stronger than that of an individual bank.

Mr. HASTINGS. I want to ask the gentleman from Alabama if in marketing these bonds it will affect the revenues of the mortgages of the farm-land bank?

Mr. STEAGALL. Except that they may take as security a landlord's share of the crop to the amount of taxes paid for the borrower and any interest due.

Mr. HASTINGS. To whom would that mortgage be eral farm loan act as to release to the fullest degree the given?

Mr. STEAGALL. The mortgage is taken by the land bank. The purpose was to terminate the practice indulged in by the banks requiring the farmer to give a mortgage on his crop and cattle and food as a condition of extension of his mortgage.

Mr. HASTINGS. Are the farm-land banks in a position to make new loans to farmers?

Mr. STEAGAIL. They are not equipped for new loans on an extensive scale. The banks have now about $115,000,000 in cash and bonds. The maturities on bonds will amount to about $42,000,000, and the interest payments on mortgages will run to $80,000,000 annually. The banks expect to collect something like 50 per cent of the maturities on their mortgages. So that you see they would have a substantial sum for new loans. It is to be remembered in that connection also that the banks are permitted to borrow from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. They have on hand $50,000,000 invested in Government bonds that is not being used for loans or any other purpose. That amount is tied up as an investment and contrary to the intention of the law. We want to see that it is used as Congress provided it should be.

Mr. HASTINGS. Is that the unused balance of the $125,-000,000?

Mr. STEAGALL. It is not all the balance, but the $50,-000,000 represents a part of the balance of the funds appropriated in the last Congress, amounting to $125,000,000.

Mr. HASTINGS. The gentleman in his own time can tell us now about what is the amount of the unused balance.

Mr. STEAGALL. The unused balance is $50,000,000, plus $29,000,000, according to the statements made before our committee.

Mr. HASTINGS. What is the condition of the $29,000,-000? Is it invested in anything?

Mr. STEAGALL. It appears in statements of balances in different banks.

Mr. HASTINGS. Then there ought to be approximately $79,000,000.

Mr. STEAGALL. There will be more than that if the banks collect half of the payments on their mortgages, which officials say they will, and which will more than pay the interest on their bonds, leaving not less than $100,000,000 for new loans.

Mr. HASTINGS. Has the gentleman in mind any information that he can give us with reference to the Farm Land Bank at Wichita, Kans., as to whether it will be able to make any new loans if this bill is passed?

Mr. STEAGALL. The statement will necessarily apply not alone to the Wichita bank, but to all of the banks, for the reason that this is a cooperative system, where every bank is responsible for the bonds of all of the banks, where the borrowings are adjusted and distributed under the control of the Federal Farm Loan Board.

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. Some days ago there passed in the Senate S. 5369, known as the Hull-Walcott bill, providing for loans or advances by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for the purpose of securing the postponement of the foreclosure of certain mortgages for a period of two years, and for other purposes. Being much in favor of this measure I wish to ask the gentleman whether or not there is a probability of the bill passing the House before adjournment at noon to-morrow.

Mr. STEAGALL. The Hull-Walcott bill was sent to the House only a day or two ago, without sufficient time remaining in which to give it proper consideration, and it will not be taken up at this session, so far as can be foreseen at this hour.

Mr. STAFFORD. When the bill was under consideration in the House a number of us were interested in the availability of the balance of $125,000,000 that was appropriated last year to stabilize existing banks. I believe the Senate bill carried no provision relating to that fund.

Mr. STEAGALL. No; there is no appropriation carried in this bill. The purpose of this bill is to so amend the Federal farm loan act as to release to the fullest degree the authority or discretion of the bank officials in making new loans and extending existing loans and to permit a more sympathetic policy toward borrowers.

Mr. STAFFORD. What disposition do the conferees take as far as section 8 of the House bill providing for the utilization of the balance of the $125.000.000?

Mr. STEAGALL. There has been no substantial change in that provision.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then that fund will no longer be available for the stabilization of the bonds of the 12 different banks.

Mr. STEAGALL. It is not being used for that now, and it is not required. The $50,000,000 is invested in Government bonds, making it a bond investment fund, and this provision would release that fund either for new loans or to be applied in paying interest on the bonds of the banks or to meet installments due on mortgages.

Mr. Speaker, I desire to use a little further time to express for myself and for the Banking and Currency Committee of the House our deep regret and sense of loss in the retirement of a number of its most useful Members. All are patriotic and valued public servants. I am sure I shall offend no one when I say that my greatest loss personally and officially is felt in connection with the separation of the distinguished gentleman from South Carolina, Mr. Stevenson, from congressional service. [Applause.]

He is a great lawyer, an upright citizen, a faithful public servant, and a deep and devoted student of public questions. He has brought to the labors of the committee a constructive capacity that I have not often seen duplicated, and certainly never surpassed by any member of that committee during the years that I have had the honor to serve as a member of it. We shall miss him personally and shall miss his able and unselfish efforts in the labors of the committee. His absence will be keenly felt. His retirement is a great loss to his party, to the incoming administration, to the Nation, and to the future welfare of the Republic. We bid him Godspeed. We wish him greater happiness and long life and health in whatever walks of life his duty or his inclination may call him. [Applause.]

He carries with him our most sincere solicitude and affectionate regard. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFadden].

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, this particular piece of legislation has not been changed materially since it left the House and went to conference. The two items, Nos. 7 and 8, which I called attention to on the floor of the House when the bill was being considered, have been modified but not specifically changed. I still have the same fear that we have weakened, to some extent, the security back of the bonds of the Federal farm-loan system by permitting to be included with the registrar, other mortgages than which are provided for under the law, new mortgages which may represent 100 per cent of sale price of the property which are taken by land banks covering the sale of real estate, title to which has been acquired by foreclosure.

As regards section 8, we still have the direction to the Federal farm-loan system to use the $50,000,000 odd being the balance remaining from the $125,000,000 that was appropriated to the Federal farm loan system a year ago for a specific purpose. The board was holding that money, the $50,000,000 odd, as a reserve against contingencies. They could use it for the payment of the interest on bonds, if the interest payments on mortgages had not been made in a sufficient amount to cover the funds for interest payments. That is the very provision that is causing some uneasiness on the part of the investors. That remains in the bill about as passed by the House, however.

I am of this opinion: That early in the next session of Congress this whole subject of the Federal farm-loan system must be dealt with, and for that reason I am hoping that the holders of the securities and the distributors of the securities will not take too seriously this direction in section 8.

Mr. Speaker, this particular legislation and the bill which has just been passed are evidences of the stressed condition under which this country is finding itself. There has been much said about the guarantee of bank deposits this afternoon. Let me say this to you, that I was told two years ago this Congress, under a crisis would pass a guarantee of deposits bill. I said, Why? The answer came back from a New York banker to the effect that the bankers of New York were afraid of the situation. They had played with the deposits of banks; they had played with the trust funds of this country in the stock market and otherwise, and those funds had been lost; worthless securities had been substituted. It was of such magnitude that they knew those funds could not be replaced, but that only the great White Father, the Government, would be able to save the situation.

I wonder if this is the crisis that those gentlemen have referred to? Let me say to you gentlemen of the House if this Congress or this Government has to guarantee the deposits of the banks of this country or has to take over the banks of this country to save the money and savings of the people in the banks of this country, I, for one, will insist upon coupling with that law that every one of the men who are responsible for this condition shall be held responsible [applause]; that responsibility shall be fixed, and those men who are responsible for this situation shall be punished in the same manner that other thieves are punished. [Applause.] These bankers, some of whom are international and others who are investment bankers, have for the past three years been trying their best to avoid the fixing of responsibility for their acts.

Mr. Speaker, for years I have been a prophet without honor in this House. I have pointed out times without number that the course we have been following in the wilderness of financial jugglery could end only in the ultimate disaster which is now upon us. I have been punished for making these prophecies. I have been denounced as a radical, I have been subjected to party discipline, my words have even been expunged from the Congressional Record.

My only consolation has been the practically unanimous approval of my constituents. They sent me here as their Representative and I have spoken in their name; they have approved what I have said. With that I am content.

Let me say now that it has never been my desire to do anything other than to maintain my oath of office and to serve my constituents and the whole people of this Nation as it has been given me to say that they should be served. I shall continue to serve them.

I lay no claim to greater wisdom than any other Member of this honorable body nor to any higher conception of duty. The honor of no Member has suffered at my hands-nor will the honor of any Member suffer at my hands unless it suffers in greater measure from himself.

We are in a crisis that looms darker than any other crisis in my memory. That crisis is our first consideration. The problem we must face is the meeting of that crisis in such a manner as to best serve the whole people of this Nation. The time has passed when we can set aside for preference any man or any men or any class of men. We can not save a few if the multitude perish. Whatever fate awaits us, it is a common fate and we must meet it together.

The golden calf of our worship is not divine. It is not a god. Money is but a tool, a convenience, a medium of exchange; we have erred in making it a master. If we are to cease our wanderings in the wilderness and come out into the promised land of common well-being, we must demote money from its mastery and return it to its position of usefulness in the world.

There exists in the world a conspiracy of wealth-a mad conspiracy whose madness threatens to engulf us all in common ruin. That is our crisis, that conspiracy.

We have met other crises in our history-simple crises that could be met simply with steel and powder and lead and flesh and blood. It is our boast that we have kept our soil inviolate. That boast is true—but we have lost the empire of our minds. We have been conquered by strange beliefs, we have been led into false worship, we have submitted to mental chains that now threaten to undo us.

I have no new forecast to make. I can only repeat what I have said before—that America must free herself from alien minds and alien beliefs and once more become herself. The American Constitution is the charter of this Republic. Under its terms we grew great; when we strayed from those terms we lost our greatness.

Paradoxically, our way forward is the way back. We have tried a new era and new beliefs. They have betrayed us. Let us turn back to sanity while we can still choose our course. In but a little time it may be too late-the power of choice may be out of our hands and in the hands of a fate too strong for us. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFadden] has expired.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the adoption of the conference report.

The previous question was ordered. The conference report was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

JOHANN WOLFGANG VON GOETHE

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 265. authorizing the acceptance by the United States of a bust of Johann Wolfgang von Goethe.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate joint resolution. There being no objection, the Clerk read the Senate joint resolution, as follows:

Senate Joint Resolution 265

Resolved, etc., That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to accept as a gift of the Goethe Society of America (Inc.) a bust of Johann Wolfgang von Goethe for erection on the public grounds of the United States in the city of Washington, D. C., on a site selected by the Director of Public Buildings and Public Parks of the National Capital, with the approval of the National Commission of Fine Arts: Provided, That if no such site suitable for the purpose shall be found, the bust shall be accepted for display in the National Museum or such other appropriate location as may indicate an appreciation of the intellectual achievements and services of Goethe to mankind.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE OF WEBER U. SIMPSON ET AL.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following communication:

MARCH 3, 1933.

Hon. JOHN N. GARNER.

Hon. John N. Garner,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

My Dear Mr. Speaker: I am transmitting herewith for your reference to the Committee on the Judiciary, for such action as the House may desire to take, the letter and subpœna duces tecum served upon me by George J. Mahr, notary public and commissioner, duly authorized and appointed to take testimony in the contested-election case of Charles H. Weber v. James Simpson, jr., and Ralph E. Church, from the tenth congressional district of the State of Illinois, for the production of certified copies of statements filed in the office of the Clerk of the House by James Simpson, ir., pursuant to the Federal corrupt practices act, for use Simpson, jr., pursuant to the Federal corrupt practices act, for use as evidence in the contested-election case of Weber v. Simpson and Church for a seat in the House of Representatives in the Seventy-third Congress.

I also submit a copy of my reply to this commission in which it will be observed that I have declined to produce certified copy of the paper in question without authority of the House of Representatives

This refusal is based upon the action of the House of Representatives as set forth in Hinds' Precedents, volume 3, paragraph 2663, page 1114, which rule of action in a similar instance has become the established practice.

Yours respectfully,

SOUTH TRIMBLE, Clerk of the House of Representatives, United States.

The SPEAKER. Referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to make a statement to the House. So far as the Chair can see at the moment no other important legislation will be considered between now and the end of the session unless an omnibus bridge bill | is reported from the Senate. In that event it is the purpose of the chair to recognize the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MILLIGAN] to call it up.

So far as the Chair is advised the balance of the afternoon will be taken up by gentlemen desiring to address the House on some agreeable subject.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, after the persiflage and eulogiums that will be delivered this afternoon, is it the purpose of the Speaker then to have the House stand in recess until to-morrow morning at 10 o'clock, or subject to the call of the Chair?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that when we are through with these eulogies and remarks, the gentleman from Illinois intends to ask unanimous consent that the House stand in recess subject to the call of the Speaker on 15 minutes' notice, with the understanding that we will take up at such time only conference reports that may be reported by the Senate.

The Chair does not recognize the gentleman from Illinois now, and the gentleman is not seeking recognition, in view of the fact that a number of Members wish to address the House, and the Chair sees no reason why we should not hear them.

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Speaker, many eulogies have been uttered here with reference to a number of our distinguished colleagues on each side of this aisle. I heartily indorse everything that has been said with reference to them. I do not intend to add anything to them.

Twenty-six years ago I served in Arkansas with one of the distinguished men who afterwards came to this House, Mr. Otis T. Wingo. I knew him there as a distinguished legislator who came to this body and served here for a number of years and then was called home. After his death the great State of Arkansas, which I have the honor in part to represent, selected his wife, Mrs. Efficiene Wingo, to serve out his unexpired term and also elected her to a full term of office.

At the close of the session to-morrow, Mrs. Wingo goes out of this Chamber voluntarily. I want to say for her that the Arkansas delegation is sad to give her up. She has been a faithful member of her delegation. She is capable and has accomplished much legislation for her people. We give her up with regret, but we are glad to say to you that we have another coming to fill her place who was a former Member of this House, Mr. Cravens, having served here for six years.

I believe you will join with me in saying that my good friend and colleague Mrs. Wingo has been faithful to every trust imposed in her. She has the absolute confidence of her constituency and the representation of Arkansas, and I know you will join with me in regretting the fact that she is leaving this body. [Applause.]

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, in these happy and sorrowful hours of leave-taking, when heart strings are being touched by the sundering of old ties, I believe it is not inappropriate that I should pay a tribute to our departing colleagues from Indiana

I believe there is an old meteorological saying that violent and tempestuous weather usually originates at Medicine Hat. If that be true, the Hoosier State must be the Medicine Hat of politics. It is a State where the political pendulum is subject to extreme vibrations. I have known the time not so long ago when every member of the Indiana congressional delegation was a Republican. The great political upheaval of last year reversed that order, and in the of the 12 members of the Indiana delegation in this House will be followers of Thomas Jefferson and friends of Franklin D. Roosevelt. The State of Hendricks, Voorhees, Marshall, Kern, and Ralston has executed a masterful flip-flop and has again vindicated its right to be called the "pivotal State."

To-morrow five of our Indiana colleagues will retire to private life, all of them men who were born in Indiana, who are indigenous to her soil and generously endowed with the ruggedness of character and homely virtue that is characteristic of the sons of Indiana, in whom is still reflected the strain of the Hoosier pioneers. HARRY C. CANFIELD, of Batesville, who entered this body in the Sixty-eighth Congress, has arisen by sheer worth to a position of high eminence as a member of the Ways and Means Committee and one of the leaders on the Democratic side. A sagacious and successful business man, he has been a tower of strength in the shaping of legislation that requires the exercise of sound business judgment. When he makes his exit from the Halls of Congress he will leave behind a host of friends. With him will go another Indiana Democrat, Representative COURTLAND C. GILLEN, who was named for one of the Indiana Democratic idols of long ago, Courtland C. Matson, and whose sterling brand of Democracy he seems somehow to have inherited.

By the modest charm of his manner, by his studious attention to the problems of legislation, and by his extraordinary ability as a lawyer Mr. Gillen has captivated those with whom he has come into contact here, and he also will be missed by a great many friends whose esteem he has won by his true and genuine qualities.

If it be true that "death loves a shining mark" it is equally true that the fickle goddess of politics prefers to shoot at conspicuous targets. Her aim was good, so far as three outstanding Republican Members of the Indiana delegation are concerned, all of whom were laid low by her accurate marksmanship. Representatives FRED S. PURNELL, of the ninth district, WILL R. WOOD, of the tenth, and DAVID Hogg, of the twelfth. While I do not agree with their political philosophy I hail them all as able champions of Republican principles. Mr. PURNELL, who has served continuously beginning with the Sixty-fifth Congress, has achieved high position as ranking Republican member of the Committee on Rules and as next to the ranking member on the Republican side of the Committee on Agriculture. He has become known nation-wide as an authority on agricultural problems. Representative Dave Hogg is closing his fourth term in the House, and in his service here he has demonstrated not only that he is a high-minded, conscientious legislator but that he is gifted with admirable courage.

When the gavel of our beloved Speaker raps out adjournment of the Seventy-second Congress to-morrow one of the landmarks of this legislative body will pass from view gone, but not forgotten." That landmark is Representative WILL R. Wood, of Indiana, the dean of the Indiana delegation in point of service. He has been 18 years a Member of this body. During my brief career in the House I have been privileged to be associated with him on the Committee on Appropriations, of which he formerly was chairman. During prolonged hearings on the Treasury and Post Office bill I sat at the table between Representative JOSEPH W. BYRNS and Representative Wood, the former being the chairman of the Democratic congressional committee and the latter chairman of the Republican congressional committee, while many of the most important financial problems of the Government were subjects of discussion

One might think that a seat between these two able and vigorous champions and defenders of rival political faiths would be a precarious situation for an innocent bystander. and at first I wondered whether I would be entirely safe, but I want to say that I never knew of politics being more beautifully adjourned than it is in that committee. Never was there the slightest inclination on the part of Mr. Wood or Mr. Byrns or any other member of the committee to turn Seventy-third Congress, soon to meet in special session, all a situation to partisan advantage. All of those around the table were actuated with a sole desire to serve the people of the United States, and no one more sincerely so than Mr. Wood. This distinguished Hoosier is such an ardent and effective champion of simplicity and economy in government, such a determined foe of bureaucracy and all that it connotes, that it sometimes seems to me he got into the wrong party, for I do not know of anyone in modern life who more thoroughly typifies the fighting qualities of old Andy Jackson, who loathed special privilege with a consuming hatred and feared neither man nor the devil. A doughty veteran of many battles against bureaucratic wrongs, Mr. Wood will be sadly missed in these halls of legislation.

And so at this time of parting, of fervent handclasps, and heartfelt expressions of good will, I take occasion to say that Indiana is proud not only of the sons whom the tide of victory is sweeping into high station but it has no apologies to offer for these five representative citizens of our State who are divesting themselves of the cares of office to-morrow and are returning to her bosom. [Applause.]

Mr. GUYER. Mr. Speaker, to-morrow three distinguished Members of the House from Kansas will sever their connection with this body. Every one of them had had a distinguished career before coming to the House.

CHARLES I. SPARKS, the junior Member, was county attorney in his home county of Boone, in Iowa, and afterwards for 15 years was judge of the district court in the State of Kansas. He had a distinguished career as judge and he has taken an active, distinguished part in the work of the Judiciary Committee since he has been in the House.

James G. Strong also had a fine public career before he came to the House of Representatives, holding the offices of city attorney, county attorney, and assistant attorney general in the State of Kansas. He came here at the same time that Mr. Hoch came, in 1919, and his services on the Banking and Currency Committee have already been highly praised on this floor. Mr. Strong goes back to Kansas, and I am sure his going is regretted by everyone in the House of Representatives.

Mr. Hoch has been referred to by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Parker] as one of the most distinguished and valuable members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. On account of his distinguished service and the splendid equipment that his work upon this committee gave him, the Governor of Kansas has made him, or will make him, the chairman of the public utilities commission, which is a powerful organization in the economic life of the State of Kansas.

We of the delegation from Kansas all regret the fact that these men are severing their connection with the House, and we bid them godspeed and hope for them the finest things in life. [Applause.]

I can not withhold just a word about some of the other Members who are leaving us by reason of the accidents and exigencies of politics. I made the assertion in a little article I wrote for the newspapers of Kansas that I could name 50 men who are so-called lame ducks whom you could not excel with a like number on the floor of the House. Great leaders like Hawley, Wood, Purnell, Michener, and a score of others like them. It is an honor for anyone to be associated with what is called the lame-duck contingent because of their distinction and their distinguished service in this House.

I see here my good friend from Wisconsin, and I want to say a word with reference to him. There is not a man upon this floor who deserves more credit for the distinguished position he has made for himself on this floor than the gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. Schafer. No one will be missed more here than this frank, eloquent, and courageous debater. [Applause.]

I also want to say a word for my progressive friend, Mr. LaGuardia. Everybody out in Kansas knows him. Everybody admires him and everybody regrets that this House will not have the benefit of his services for the next two years, at least. His painstaking industry, honesty, and courage have no superior in the House of Representatives. [Applause.]

I would say this about all of the men who are leaving. These distinguished men have raveled out their lives here like prodigal spendthrifts in the service of their country. They deserve more than they are getting from the country at this time.

I read in a newspaper the other day, one column assailing the Congress as venal and extravagant and in the next column, which was a 40-years-ago column, I read where Samuel J. Randall, a former Speaker of this House, had just died and that his estate had been appraised and found to be of the pitiable sum of $190. All, the paper said, he was able to save in 30 years' service in the House of Representatives.

I would say of every man from Kansas who is leaving this House that he would have been far better off, financially, if he had never entered the portals of the House of Representatives. However, they were serving not for money, they were serving their country. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, to-morrow the State of Texas loses two of its delegation in the House.

The Hon. Guinn Williams has served as a Member of this House faithfully and well for 12 years. He retires voluntarily. He was not a candidate for reelection. Mr. Williams at this time is chairman of the Committee on Territories. He has also served, if I am not mistaken, and is at this time a member of the Committee on Insular Affairs, the Committee on Elections No. 3, and the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments.

Mr. Williams rendered very fine service in the Committee on Insular Affairs, where he had a great deal to do with shaping the legislation which resulted in Philippine independence. [Applause.]

For his service here in that regard he is entitled to the highest recognition, because it was due to his long service on the committee and his earnest support of Philippine independence that it was finally accomplished at this session of Congress.

His work on Elections No. 3 has been notably worthy. In a number of election contests Mr. Williams has by his work, not only in committee but in presenting the committee's reports on the floor of the House, has rendered splendid service and enabled the House to reach a right conclusion in several notable contests for a seat in the House.

Mr. WILLIAMS is a man who comes from the West and who is stamped with that figure of independence of thought that is characteristic of the people who hall from that section.

He is a man whose personality has made its imprint on this House. He has as many friends on one side of the aisle as he has on the other. It is with a sense of deep regret that we shall lose his valuable services as a Member of this House.

I hope wherever he goes, whatever his future may be, that he may still meet with that fine friendship in other fields that he has won here among the Membership of this body. [Applause.]

Mr. BRUMM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BRUMM. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, my experience here this afternoon certainly vindicates the thoughts of Tennyson that, He also serves who only stands and waits.

Unlike the proverbial brook, men do not go on forever. Of the great hosts that pass through our lives, how few of them really leave their footprints on the sands of time or even are recorded in the album of our friendships.

As the great throng passes on, here and there we sometimes see standing out by sheer force of character and personality certain great characters, whom to see is to be attracted, and to know is to love and respect.

Six years ago, from the State of Illinois, one John Allen was sent to this House to represent the northern section of that State—a valued member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, and later on of the Appropriations Committee. I know of no character in this House who I believe has greater political judgment and capacity than this | same kindly and courtly gentleman.

Born amid the mountains of Vermont, near the shores of the beautiful Lake Champlain, a veritable Green Mountain boy, in fact, a collateral of the great picturesque Ethan Allen of Ticonderoga fame, breathing the same free mountain spirit of independence. His course has been distinctly a constructive one, never resorting to the histrionic or the dramatic, never meteoric, or scintillating rather by refraction and friction with the stratosphere than by its own light, but steadfast as the North Star, fixed and constant, showing by its own effulgence the polar index to those who would seek a safe course. He knew better the great national leaders of the last 40 years than anyone I have ever met, thoroughly versed in politics and familiar with its history. He was a distinguished character here, though always modest and in the background. I know of his service, I know of his kindness, I know of his lovable character, and I know of his stalwart Americanism. I know of his integrity and soundness of mind. He was of the men who, by the late sweep of passion which swept over the country, had been ripped from their moorings; sound and sane statesmen who stood for the America which the fathers knew and who shall be missed in this Congress. These men are invaluable, these men who think, who do not stand in the spotlight, but who solve the problems of this great country. These silent men are they who shall be missed in making up the sane and solid judgment of an intelligent Congress. I know I represent my own delegation and, I believe, the thought of the entire House, when I write him down as amongst those whom you, my colleagues, love the best. I see he is not in the Chamber and I shall not say good-by. but shall rather use the term which my own people in my State have used for generations, "Auf wiedersehen"-till we meet again, and may God be with you. [Applause.]

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen of the House, I do not want to let this occasion pass without paying a few words of tribute to the service, ability, and character of one of the outstanding figures in this Congress; a man, who with the close of the Seventy-second Congress passes from our midst into other fields of activity. I refer to the Hon. Ewin L. Davis, of Tennessee, chairman of the House Committee on Merchant Marine, Radio, and Fisheries. It has been my pleasure to serve with him on that committee for quite a number of years. He has been one of the most conspicuous figures in this House in the fight for the preservation of the rights of the American people and in the development of activities so essential to the happiness and welfare of all. His departure from our midst is going to be a severe loss. He, as much as any man that I know of, has promoted the expansion of the American merchant marine and materially aided in giving us a real merchant fleet on the high seas—a fleet exceeded by only one nation something, which before the World War, we did not possess. He has materially aided in securing and preserving to the people the priceless heritage of the air for radio communication. I am sure that one of the greatest tributes that can be paid to him or any other man is that he has always had at heart the interests of the people and sought to serve them in every way he could. The great fight that he made for the preservation to the people of the United States of the channels through the air will never be for-

We take it as a matter of course these days to hear not only national, but world-wide communication over the radio. It has not occurred to many that there would have been erected throughout this land on these airways toll gates which would have prevented the great bulk of the people of our country from receiving these programs, unless they paid tribute, had it not been for the fine and heroic work that Judge Davis has done in collaboration with others so interested in that work. It was he who insisted upon an equitable apportionment of the priceless radio frequencies or wave lengths to the various sections of this country. It was he who insisted on regional representation on the Federal Radio Commission, so that the rights of the people of every part of rates—the increase of 50 per cent on letter postage. I feel the country might be appreciated and respected. It was he who insisted in an uncompromising way that those who claim ownership of the highways through the air had no right to the air; that in order to continue utilizing the air waves they must relinquish such claims and take licenses from the Government of the United States and recognize the right of the ownership as vested in the people of the United States. He has a mastery of the problems of the merchant marine and of radio unsurpassed by any. I know that his colleagues and the people of this country will miss tremendously the benefit of his counsel, advice, and assistance. And I am sure that when he leaves the House of Representatives he carries with him the affectionate regard of his fellow Members-and the millions of his fellow citizens whom he has so faithfully and loyally served. [Applause.1

POSTAL RATES

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, the House Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads has reached the conclusion that one of the greatest blunders in connection with the operation of the mail service of the country was the increase of the first-class rate on letters from 2 to 3 cents per ounce. As soon as the new Congress is organized I will submit a proposal to amend the law and to restore the rates which were in existence prior to July of last year. We have come to the conclusion, based upon advices from many of the large cities of the country, that there is a widespread disposition on the part of the biggest patrons of the Postal Service to evade the additional cost of postage by finding means for communicating with customers, patrons, and business associates other than those afforded by the Postal Service.

The whole history of the Postal Service from the days of Franklin to the administration of Postmaster General Brown shows that attempts to wipe out or reduce the deficit in the postal revenues through increasing the rate of postage on letters has in every instance produced the exact opposite effect from that desired. I am prepared to furnish both Houses of Congress with reports, official and unofficial, which bear out this contention; receipts of the Postal Service during the past eight months substantiate this contention that the higher the letter rate is made the less the income becomes.

Letters received from postal officials in more than a score of the principal cities in all sections of the country show beyond dispute that the effort to reduce postage expenses through the use of messengers, the radio, and other means is not confined to any one section of the country but is general everywhere from the Atlantic to the Pacific and from the Canadian border to the Rio Grande. Based on the official count taken by the Post Office Department during the month of October, 1932, the drop in the number of firstclass letters for the fiscal year 1933 will be 5,000,000,000 pieces. In other words, instead of 13,000,000,000 the reports will show that the number of pieces of first-class matter mailed between July 1, 1932, and June 30, 1933, will be about 8,000,000,000 pieces. This means a loss of a hundred million dollars on the 2-cent rate.

On May 3, 1931, during the hearings before the Committee on Finance of the Senate, when the revenue act of 1932 was being considered, the Postmaster General made this statement:

An increase of 1 cent on the first-class postal rate, if it applies to letters for delivery outside the post office of origin, would raise substantially a hundred million dollars. Twenty-five or thirty million more could be raised theoretically by increasing the rate on what we call "drop" letters, or letters that are mailed for delivery at the post office where they originate.

The 3-cent rate applies to both classes. But instead of increasing the postal receipts by a hundred and thirty million dollars nearly the exact opposite will be shown to have resulted when the final figures for the fiscal year are compiled next July.

It would seem to be an opportune time for interested postal patrons to demonstrate to the country at large and Congress in particular the fallacy of exorbitant postal certain that if the desires of the patrons of the mails are properly presented the result will be the restoration of the old 2-cent rate by Congress during the coming regular session, if it can not be done during the special gathering which is expected to be called early this coming spring.

Here are some of the official replies received in response to requests to report the effect of the increased rate upon the receipts in their respective offices. This survey clearly indicates the futility of attempting to increase revenue by increasing postal rates:

NEW YORK

NEW YORK

A representative publisher, one of the heaviest mailers at that office, mailed during the first six months of the present year 580,000 notices to subscribers, whose subscribtions were expiring, at the 2-cent rate. When the postage rate was increased to 3 cents the publishing company sent notices out under the provisions of section 435½, Postal Laws and Regulations, at 1 cent per piece; the number of pieces sent out during the second half of the year was 432,000. In other words, in addition to a reduction of 1 cent per piece postage received by the post office in this case, the number of mailings was also reduced by 148,000, or about 25 per cent.

There are numerous instances in which business concerns are economizing on the use of postage. I would cite as typical of a group the owner of a garage accommodating approximately 300 cars. The monthly bills in this case are placed in the cars, so that when the customers call for their cars they receive the bills. in this manner. Other instances are reported of certain lodges sending out meeting notices, etc.; also neighborhood stores, such as provision, grocery, or other small businesses, whose patrons run accounts, sending out bills by delivery employees instead of through the mail as formerly.

INDIANAPOLIS

Even before the actual passing of the legislation raising the rate on first-class matter from 2 to 3 cents per ounce, many inquiries were received concerning ways to evade the higher charge. After the new rate became effective the number of these inquiries doubled and trebled. * *

Three large creameries located in this city, who formerly mailed numerous weekly checks to farmers throughout the State, now use a post card. These cards are so prepared that they constitute an order on the banks for the amount due the shipper, and are used in lieu of the check formerly sent under cover of an envelope and at letter-rate postage.

Chain stores are using their own employees to carry orders, invoices, etc., to, from, and between their various stores.

Another feature we have found is connected with large industrial and commercial firms with many and varied departments. Formerly each department sent out their own letters, thus causing many pieces of mail from that one firm. Now this mail is all centralized at one point, where it is consolidated and the various inclosures are all placed in one large envelope for each particular addressee.

We believe that 500,000 pieces per month is a conservative estimate of the loss in volume at this office due to the increase in the postage rate on letter mail.

PITTSBURGH

Since the postage rate on first-class matter was increased two of our large department stores have resorted to the delivery of their monthly statements to charge customers by their own em-

During the first seven months of the year the mailings of the monthly statements from one of these stores averaged 84,313 pieces, while during the last five months the pieces in each malling averaged only 7,747, a decrease of 76,566 pieces per month, representing postage amounting to $2,296.98 per month.

of monthly statements by their own employees, but the office is in possession of information indicating that such action is contemplated.

MEMPHIS

Beginning in August last, the Memphis Power & Light Co. (public utilities) began the delivery by hand of its monthly bills. The August deliveries by hand aggregated 36,944 pleces, and this number increased to 43,604 pleces in November, this number being a fair average of hand deliveries at this time. This was all first-class matter chargeable at 3 cents each, and which was lost to the Post Office Department. * * *

We are informed, and have every reason to believe, that the Bry-Block Mercantile Co. is having its bills and statements delivered by a central distributing company, a company formed for the purpose of making deliveries for the Bry Co. and for other concerns desiring that service, and that active solicitation is being made for other business. This condition has been reported to the department, and this office has been informed proper investigation will be made. * *

The volume during the months of September, October, and vestigation will be made. * * *

The volume during the months of September, October, and November this year shows a decrease of 24½ per cent under the volume for the same period last year.

of concerns are now mailing at the third-class rate of postage matter properly of that class which was formerly mailed at the letter rate. The volume of this matter is quite large.

NEW ORLEANS

There is an approximate 10 to 13 per cent decrease in first-class matter handled since July 1, 1932, as compared with the months just prior to that date chargeable to the increase in rates of

LOUISVILLE

Possibly the largest deflection from the Postal Service was on the part of two of our large creamery companies. They formerly mailed their checks and statements to milk producers in this State and southern Indiana by first-class letter mail, but they are now using postal cards. * * *

There are a number of local advertisers who formerly mailed There are a number of local advertisers who formerly mailed circular matter as first class when the rate was 2 cents, who are now mailing them unsealed at either the regular rate of 1½ cents, or under section 435½, Postal Laws and Regulations, by which they receive a 1-cent rate. It is possible that if the rate were reduced to 2 cents many of them would prefer to pay the extra one-half cent and mail the matter as first class rather than as circulars. as circulars.

Fifty of our largest mailers report that they are diverting from the Postal Service monthly 39,890 letters, which represents $1,196.70 in postage in postage.

One item forcibly brought to our attention by this survey was that quite a number of our patrons who formerly used letters have now switched over to the use of 1-cent postal cards.

One of our patrons declares that they have curtailed their postage account by $250 per month. Another informs us that he has continued to hold down his postage account to $20,000 annually, notwithstanding a 50 per cent increase in postage rates. Another, who formerly expended $8,500 per annum for first-class postage, states that he is spending less this year, regardless of the increase in postage rates.

In conclusion I would say that the consensus of the opinion would be that the increase in the letter rate was unwise and has injured the service far more than helped it and has reduced the volume of revenue considerably.

Many of our large customers have curtailed their advertising departments to a very great extent, and some of them have actually closed up and abandoned all advertising, primarily due to the 3-cent stamp.

to the 3-cent stamp.

"Everyone seems to have the postage-saving thought. Yesterday we received our monthly statement of gasoline and oil purchases made by our salesmen throughout Virginia and North Carolina by hand from the Standard Oil Co., and at home last night a church-notice post card bore the address of five members of our household instead of the usual individual announcement."

"As you are probably aware, we sell our goods throughout the United States by mail, and we are able, through various and sundry means, to keep our postage bill down to its usual $20,000 figure as against the $30,000 that the Government was hoping for when it raised the postage rate."—The Duplex Co. (Inc.).

"Realizing that an increase in the first-class postage rate from 2 to 3 cents would, on the same basis as 1931, involve an extra expense, which could not be passed on, of about $4,250, we began to look into the question of sending mail under 1-cent postage and also to more seriously consider a limiting of the mailing list.

"Though our first-class postage bill in 1931 amounted to a little better than $8,500, we find that after an increase in the first-class postage of 50 per cent our postage bill is less than it was in 1931."—The Envelope & Printing Co. (Inc.).

CINCINNATI

In some cases the matter [diverted from the mails] was delivered by messengers employed by the firm for this work. In other cases they were hiring the Western Union and the Postal Telegraph Cos. for this purpose. It has become common practice to deliver circular matter, either inclosed or without inclosure, to the private homes throughout the city.

BOSTON

Some of the public welfare departments of the 25 cities and towns which comprise the Boston postal district are employing their people to distribute their tax bills, real estate, poll, water, and motor-vehicle excise bills. Some of the newspapers are distributing bills by using boys who deliver the papers at the homes, instead of sending them by first-class mail.

SAN FRANCISCO

Several of the utility companies of this city are distributing part of their mail by their own messengers, as are also insurance com-panies, banks, some fraternal organizations, railroads, and some small bank concerns; and some of the larger milk companies and bakeries are having their bills delivered by their drivers.

The decrease in volume at the 3-cent rate against the former 2-cent rate is approximately 11½ per cent.

CLEVELAND

volume for the same period last year.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

The greatest loss of revenue to this office incident to the increased letter rate is attributed to the fact that a large number

It is believed that over 500,000 pieces of first-class mail matter are thus diverted from Post Office channels. The majority of the larger firms state that if a 2-cent rate is restored they will again mail such matter through the Post Office Department.

It is a fact that all kinds of schemes are being used to divert from the mails advertising matter, and in many instances statements of account are being sent through the mails on post and postal cards to avoid the 3-cent rate.

Lists of concerns, former patrons, now making monthly deliveries by private messengers:

	Pieces
Seattle City (Municipal) Water Department	65,000
Merchants Exchange	1,000
Puget Sound Power & Light Co
Western Union Telegraph Co
Postal Telegraph Co
Seattle Gas Co	80,000
McKay Printing Co	2,000
Seattle Tool & Supply Co
Metropolitan Laundry Co
Carnation Co.	3,000
R. G. Dun	10,000
E. L. Bussey	3, 500
Seattle Hardware Co	3,000

It may be conservatively stated that no less than 100,000 bank statements and 50,000 statements from other small concerns are diverted monthly in addition to the above.

One of our local banks has discontinued mailing monthly statements to patrons having a checking account; patrons have been requested to call for such statements, uncalled-for statements being delivered by the bank messenger.

Cancellations of first-class matter for the period from September 1 to November 30 have decreased approximately 17 per cent compared with cancellations for the same period in 1931.

DES MOINES

You are advised that the experience of this office is that approximately 12 firms, including 2 public utilities, are at the present time delivering their statements or bills outside of the Postal Service by special messengers. * *

A rough estimate could possibly be placed at 75,000 per month.

NEW HAVEN

It is estimated that the total loss in revenue per year at this fice from deliveries now being made outside the post office amounts to approximately $17,050.80.

DALLAS

I find that approximately 175,000 statements are being delivered in this manner [special messengers] monthly by 18 business concerns. Two utility companies are handling their statements in this manner—the Dallas Power & Light Co., approximately 50,000 statements monthly, and the Dallas City Water Department, 56,000 statements monthly, both being inclosed in sealed envelopes.

The decrease in postal revenues at this office is due largely to the following factors: Increased use of third class instead of first class. Increased use of postal cards instead of letters. Decreased use of the mails due to general business conditions.

CHICAGO

It has been learned that a number of our large patrons have made changes in their mailing departments looking to the elimi-nation of duplicate mailings to one address on any one day. That is to consolidate the correspondence of two or more separate departments of a firm so that all the correspondence to one address may be mailed under one cover, thereby reducing the postage bill. * * postage bill.

There are a number of contributing factors in the decline of postal revenue at this office besides the general decline in business. Principal of these are the increased use of the radio for advertising purposes and a pronounced increase in private house-to-house distribution of advertising matter.

Yesterday a representative of a private mailing bureau called me on the phone and wanted to know whether there is any ruling of the Post Office Department prohibiting the inclosing of several bills in one envelope. I told him there could be no objection so long as the envelopes were sealed and postage pre-paid at first-class rates. He thanked me for this information and hung up the phone.

I now make the prediction that if postage is not reduced on letters for local delivery very soon, private enterprise will establish and maintain central offices for combining bills from several business concerns in one envelope for each debtor. It will be a profitable business for such private enterprise and a heavy loss in revenues to the post office

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

It is estimated that possibly 100,000 bills per month which were formerly mailed at this office are not now received.

With respect to the receipts of the New York post office during the six months ended December 31, 1932, as compared with the same period in 1931, the following information is furnished:

	$33, 379, 246, 26
July 1 to Dec. 31, 1932	32, 720, 374. 57

658, 871, 69

Here is a list of some of the methods employed to escape increased rates:

- 1. Changing from first class to third class, that is, to the 1-cent rate
 - 2. Changing from letters to postal cards.
- 3. By the use of Western Union or Postal Telegraph messenger service.
- 4. By the delivery of mail by the use of their own employees.
- 5. By consolidating all mailing departments in large organizations.
 - 6. By dispatching bills with goods or shipment.
 - 7. By employing independent mail distributing agencies.
 - 8. By addressing one letter or notice to a group of people.
- 9. By reducing the amount of mail advertising, and so
- 10. By going out of the mail-advertising business entirely, and using the radio instead of the mails.

I recommend the following: First, reduce the rates and increase the volume. Second, protect our postal monopolydrive out competition, thus minimizing the deficit.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, I have listened with sympathetic interest to the eulogies that have been delivered. We can appreciate those encomiums because we are familiar with the service of our friends and our colleagues to whom they referred. Criticism of the Congress is criticism of the people, because, with the exception of the Chief Executive and Vice President, elected through the Electoral College, the Members of the two branches of Congress are the only public servants of approximately 1,000,000 serving our Government who are chosen directly by the people themselves. We understand the difficulties, the embarrassment of service of this nature.

It was your pleasure and mine to serve in this body with a distinguished son of Tennessee, Edward Eslick. We stood by helpless and saw him, after years of arduous and efficient labor, stricken here at his post. I rise of my own volition to say a word in praise of his successor. The electors of that district in Tennessee saw fit to send to this body in his stead. for the remaining part of this Congress, Mrs. WILLA B. ESLICK. [Applause.]

It has been my pleasure to serve as chairman of a committee of which she has been a member, and having long known her personal charm, I had an opportunity in the service on that committee to observe also her oustanding ability, her keen intellect, which have enabled her so faithfully to carry on for her people and for the Nation work of the same efficient character which her lamented husband contributed to our country before her. She is of gracious manner, of rare charm, and we part with her with regret, not only because of those personal attainments and the fascination that goes with them but because of the service she has rendered and could render to our common country. She has been interested in legislation before our committee; has served in presenting to the House several reports of that committee. I could not find it in my heart to see this good woman of Tennessee, whom we all know and whom we all admire, go back to her home and back to her friends whom her beloved husband had served before her without hearing an expression from some one here to assure her that she carries with her our affectionate regard and every good wish for a future filled with health and happiness and prosperity. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Lanham] has expired.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, the election of last November brought about probably the greatest change in the personnel of the United States Senate and the House of Representatives that has occurred at any election during the past half century. This Seventy-second Congress will expire within a few hours, and a large number of our colmany years, will retire to private life.

The sincere tributes of friendship, admiration, and good will that have been expressed for many of them are most eminently proper and richly deserved. Owing to their large number it is impossible to pay a tribute to all of them, but I want to say a few words about some of the western Members.

As you all know, for a great many years there have been only three or four Democrats here from all the 12 Western States, and we few Democrats have of necessity, and of mutual interest and friendship, been working side by side with the Republicans in Congress. There is a real friendship and a genuine admiration that has grown up among us western Members that supercedes and entirely eclipses all political considerations, and I can not resist an expression of kindness and personal admiration for and gratitude to them. Our parting at this time is with genuine sadness.

The fact that the entire Membership of the House from the Western arid and Rocky Mountain States is only about 4 per cent of the Membership of this body compels us to practically ignore political affiliations, and to work together for our mutual success and the general welfare of the West, and we constantly do that, loyally and sincerely. When we have confidently depended upon each other so much, and are under so many and such deep and lasting obligations to each other for hundreds of kind acts of assistance and encouragement, it would be less than human if we did not both feel and express that admiration for each other and candidly and gladly acknowledge our profound gratitude to each other and our sincere regrets at our parting.

I want to mention especially the names of a few of those old Members of the House from the West who have always been very dear and helpful to me, men who have been very useful not only to their States but to the entire West, and who have courageously helped to upbuild, defend, and maintain the best traditions of the pioneer spirit, energy, loyalty, vigor, and patriotism that has subdued, reclaimed, and developed our great western empire.

I am proud to say that never, during all these years, has any one of these western Representatives who are now retiring to private life ever in any manner or by any official act brought any reproach whatever upon their States or upon the proud West, and, regardless of politics, we are good enough sportsmen to gladly acknowledge their intrinsic merit, their helpfulness, and their loyalty to their States and to our country. They retire from this House without the slightest blemish upon their records. The Congress and the country, and more especially the West, are losing many splendid men, and I feel that they richly deserve all the eloquent tributes that are paid to them.

BURTON L. FRENCH, of Idaho, and WILLIS C. HAWLEY, of Oregon, have each served in this House for 26 years. They have to their credit many hundreds of beneficial acts during their distinguished careers. I have been especially closely associated with Mr. French for many years, on the Appropriations Committee and on the Interior Department subcommittee, and I feel it is only paying him a most just and richly deserved acknowledgment to say that I have never known a more efficient Member of this House. He has always been an exceptionally helpful and constructive member of that committee, and I will miss his splendid assistance more than any other Member of this Congress. It is no disparagement to anyone else to say that it will be utterly impossible to find any man who can fill his place on that committee. No one else has the wide personal experience, thorough knowledge and mature judgment sufficient to be of the really great assistance that he has always been to us. I confidently expected that sometime in the not distant future there would be placed upon his shoulders the mantle of those really great chairmen, Joseph G. Cannon and Martin B. Madden, of that greatest committee in Congress, and he would have worn it with superb efficiency, dignity, and honor. He served for several years with great distinction as chairman of the naval affairs subcommittee, and I think that committee will be hard to fill.

leagues, with whom we have served so harmoniously for so | he knows more about the Navy than any other man in Congress. I personally know that Burton L. French and AD-DISON T. SMITH have been worth many millions of dollars to the State of Idaho.

> In the winter of 1930 and 1931, I investigated the records of Congress, and the terms of service of all the Members of both the Senate and House and all Territorial Delegates from the Western States and Territories from the time Mexico ceded to the United States, by the Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, a large part of the western portion of our country on February 2, 1848, to that time and compiled what I termed "a congressional directory of the West," in chronological order, according to longevity of service, and on February 9, 1931, I inserted it in the Congressional Record at pages 4404 to 4414 of part 4, volume 74, of the third session of the Seventy-first Congress. From that RECORD and the congressional directories since then, it will appear that Mr. Hawley, Mr. French, Mr. Frank W. Mondell, of Wyoming, and I are the only men thus far, during the entire history of our country, who have ever been honored by an election to Congress 13 terms, from any one of the 16 Western States. I wonder how long it will be before that record will be excelled by four other men from the West? Every Member of Congress knows that a service in this body for 26 years does not occur by chance. It is only accomplished by a man absolutely and conscientiously devoting every possible energy there is in him, both mentally and physically, day in and day out, and year in and year out, to the service of his constituents. In these strenuous and kaleidoscopic times, when every man and woman in the United States is, every day of their lives, looking to Washington and to Congress for something, our constituents never will or can realize the humanly impossible amount of work that is heaped upon their Congressmen.

> ADDISON T. SMITH, of Idaho, and ALBERT JOHNSON, of Washington, have each served with us for 20 years, during much of which time Mr. SMITH was a very capable chairman of the Committee on Irrigation, the same committee of which I had the honor of being chairman about 16 years ago; and Mr. Johnson was chairman of the most difficult Committee on Immigration for many years. He is entitled to the everlasting thanks of our Nation for manfully and patriotically preventing the influx of many millions of utterly undesirable immigrants into our country. Both he and Smith always handled the affairs of their respective committees in an honorable, courageous, and admirable manner, and they rendered splendid services to their States, to Congress, and to our country for 20 years.

From my own State, Charles B. Timberlake, and from the State of Washington, LINDLEY H. HADLEY, have each served for 18 years. They have both been on the Ways and Means Committee for a great many years, and their services have always been efficient and loyal. Work on that great committee gives a man scarcely any opportunity of individual distinction, but the work is long and tedious, and these two men richly deserve their full shares of the credit for the enormous amount of constructive, beneficial, and history-making legislation that that committee has brought forth during all those years.

HENRY E. BARBOUR, of California; GUY U. HARDY, of Colorado; and John W. Summers, of Washington; have each served in Congress for 14 years. They have all three been members of the Appropriations Committee for many years, and I have worked with them all of that time. For many years Barbour was chairman of the Subcommittee on Military Affairs, and he always stood heroically and defiantly for our national defense. I think he knows more about our Army than any other man in Congress. I personally know the loyalty to their constituents, and the faithfulness of all three of these men to their congressional work. Their official acts and diligent and splendid services to Congress, to their constituents, and to our country have always been efficient, creditable, and entitled to the utmost appreciation by their constituents and by our country. Their places on

PHILIP D. SWING and ARTHUR M. FREE, of California, and | service to us, and I am proud to pay this humble tribute to Don B. Colton, of Utah, have each served with us here for 12 years. As all the old Members of this House know, Mr. Swing put in about 10 years of persistent, tactful, and wonderfully courageous and effective work in bringing about the construction of the Boulder Canyon Dam. He is entitled to more credit than any other one human being for that marvelous achievement, which will be a just and proud monument to his memory for a thousand years. I have always admired him, and was on many occasions glad to help him in that great history-making work.

I have not been personally associated with Mr. Free, as I have with Messrs. Swing and Colton, but I know he has been a very capable and worthy Member of the House.

Don Colton and I live in adjoining counties. We have known each other almost from our boyhood days. Before coming to Congress we practiced law in the frontier portions of our States for many years, when we were so happy and so poor-we are still poor. Our relations have always been close, and I have admired him and highly appreciated his friendship and cooperation. His constituents and mine are the same kind of splendid, courageous, hardy, pioneer people and have the same interests. After he had worked so long and succeeded in passing through the House his bill to regulate the use of the remaining 173,000,000 acres of the public domain, I was genuinely sorry indeed that the Senate did not act upon it. However, by his long, thorough, and persistent work he has laid the foundation for the enactment of that great piece of constructive legislation, and when it is finally brought about—as it should and, I believe, will be-Don Colton will be entitled to a very large part of the credit for it. He was for a long time a splendid and greatly admired chairman of the Public Lands Committee, and I can confidently say to our neighbor State of Utah that she has never had a more faithful son than Don COLTON.

Mr. Scott Leavitt, of Montana, and Mr. Samuel S. ARENTZ, of Nevada, have each served with us for 10 years. Mr. Leavitt was for many years chairman of the Indian Affairs Committee. He made a great study of the vast and varied conditions of the nearly 200 tribes of Indians scattered throughout our country, and he brought to that committee an exceptional capability and energy. The Indians throughout our entire country will always owe him a debt of real gratitude for his patient, unselfish, loyal, tedious, and hard work in their behalf.

Mr. Arentz has always been a tower of strength and of information on the Public Lands, Irrigation and Reclamation, and Mines and Mining Committees. No one knew the conditions or the needs of the West better than he, and our entire western country owes to him a debt of appreciation for his energy, efficiency, and devotion to our upbuilding.

There is one other Republican, not of the West, whom I am proud to mention, and that is Mr. Frank Murphy, of Ohio. He has served with us for 14 years, and about 12 years of that time he and I have been very closely associated on the Appropriations Committee, and on the wonderfully interesting subcommittee of the Interior Department. We have been as close to each other as two brothers. I think our relations have been as intimate as those of any two Members of this House. Had it not been for the change in the political complexion of the House two years ago, he, instead of I, would now be the chairman of that committee. and I would have gladly served upon the committee under him, as loyally and as proudly as he has during my chairmanship.

While his constituents had no direct personal interest in the thousands of affairs of that department, extending from the Arctic Circle to the Equator, he always worked as hard and put in as many long hours and as many hard days of investigation of the welfare of the Indians, and all the vast and varied interests of the Interior Department, as if he had represented a western district. The West gratefully acknowledges and genuinely appreciates his long and faithful him. The national parks, the reclamation projects, all the Indian tribes throughout the West, the Geological Survey, the Howard University, and many other activities all owe him a debt of respect and lasting gratitude. In our Rocky Mountain mining parlance, as a fine, clear, square-shooting fellow, Frank Murphy assays up as high as any man in this House. May his future days be long and happy.

My colleague, William R. Eaton, of Colorado, has served with us four years, and Mr. Frederick C. Loofbourow, of Utah, has served only about two years, and each one of them has been very industrious and exceptionally energetic, and has made a good record.

All of these 17 western Republicans retire to private life without the slightest blemish upon their records. The congressional careers of these men, along with over a hundred more Members of this Seventy-second Congress, were cut short last fall by the same inexorable political fate that befell the Democrats on election day in 1920. In each election there was practically a unanimous and irresistible demand by the American people for a change in the White House, and a reversal or a very radical modification in the administrative policies of our Government in Washington. There was an emphatic determination to clean house and have a new deal in our national affairs, and the personal equation of the local candidates cut comparatively little

There is one Democrat from the Rocky Mountain West who retires to private life with this Congress; that is, John M. Evans, of Montana, the present chairman of the Public Lands Committee. He has served with us for 16 years, and has always been a vigorous and capable Representative and champion of the West. We are all proud of him, and his State should be proud of him, because he has given the best of his splendid abilities for a large part of his life to the upbuilding of Montana in particular and to all the West in general.

It is with a sincere feeling of genuine sadness that we part with all of these old friends to-morrow. They have been splendid colleagues of ours; they are fine fellows. They are faithful sons of Uncle Sam. They have been helpful to us, and resourceful and effective workers. Their characters and courageous western spirits have been a profound inspiration to the Members of Congress who have associated with them during all of these years and to the entire West, and there is a personal sorrow in our saying good-by. We wish them health, happiness, success, and long lives. I hope, for the welfare of our country, that their successors will profit by their labors, their example, and their diligence, and will be able to carry on the very important work that these men have so long and so faithfully performed. [Applause.]

ROOSEVELT, THE LEADER

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks and to include a brief poem by a young friend of mine who has written it on the title "Roosevelt, the Leader."

Mr. BLANTON. Lady or man? Mr. McSWAIN. He is a young man who works in a cot-

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I am printing an original poem by a young friend of mine, Charles M. Price, of Charlotte, N. C., entitled "Roosevelt Is Leading."

ROOSEVELT IS LEADING

When March the fourth goes rolling by Old Herbert H. will heave a sigh, And pack his goods and go back home, While the people wish he had never come.

Now Franklin R. comes stepping in And rides about with a happy grin; But under his smiles is a big, hard stick; And sure as we live, he'll turn the trick.

Be patient, folks, and give Frank a chance, He can't parade nor drill nor dance; But he's got a brave and noble heart, And sure as life he'll do his part.

The Democrats have rallied, The Republicans had to squall; Hoover messed up the Government, And we have to suffer for it all.

Now Roosevelt is our leader, And he is a man that the world well knows, Honest and fair dealings with his fellow men Is Roosevelt's motto.

We can go to him with our troubles, Work is something he never shuns; He will bring back prosperity, Because he knows just how its done.

But on the noble fourth of March, The people will begin to shout, Roosevelt will enter the White House And Hoover will have to step out.

-Charles M. Price.

THE WAY OUT

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I enjoyed very much the splendid discussion of the West and its problems by my good friend the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. Taylor] just a few minutes ago.

I had the privilege of visiting the great West on three occasions during my service here as a Member of Congress and once prior thereto and learned to love those people who live out there on the wonderful, magnificent Pacific coast. I found that out there they have great mountains, great trees, and great men and women. Just here let me say, I am truly glad President-elect Roosevelt went to the Far West for the selection of two Members of his Cabinet. It is most unfortunate that one of these appointees, the late Senator Walsh, should have died without serving his Nation in these trying times as Attorney General.

I am also most happy over the other appointment, that of Gov. George H. Dern, of Utah. I have known him and appreciated his ability and integrity for many years. In him the Nation will have a most excellent Secretary of War. He comes from the splendid Mormon State of Utah, where he moved after being reared and educated in Nebraska. Some years ago while visiting Utah I was informed that while Governor Dern is not a Mormon he was elected governor in a State where the majority of the voters are of the Mormon faith; that in Salt Lake City, where a majority of the voters are not Mormons, a Mormon mayor was elected: and that the good people of Utah do not at all let their religious opinions interfere with their selection of the very best officials or the faithful discharge of their obligations as citizens. In fact, I found all the people of the great West to be people of the East and South who had moved out there and are broad, liberal, splendid folk. I remember very pleasantly being at a picnic at Pasco, in the State of Washington, where those people of that section had gathered to discuss their irrigation problems. They had had drier weather than usual, had failed to make a crop, and they were about the bluest group of people I ever saw gathered together.

My good friend, Mr. Addison Smith, at that time chairman of the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation, and who had charge of our group of Members of Congress, after several long but good speeches had been made, came to me and asked me to make about a 3-minute speech and endeavor to get those people to forget their troubles and laugh just a little if I could. I told him I did not know whether I could do so or not, but that I would try by letting them know I was in sympathy with them just as I am with my own people and then telling them a story.

I remember walking out to the front of the stage and looking at those people—nearly 3,000 of them, farmers and their wives and their children—gathered from all over that country. I said:

Ladies and gentlemen, I have learned to love you people of the great Northwest, and I do not mind telling you why I love you. I love you because I find you are the same kind of people who live down in the district I represent in Georgia.

I said:

I love you furthermore because I see here a great group of good men and good women gathered from all over this great country of ours. I love you because I see here people from the country—the best people on earth—and because I do not see in this crowd gathered here to-day any flappers.

I said:

Do you know who fiappers are? Flappers are girls who walk the streets of the big cities and are more mindful of worldly pleasure than of being helpful to others and to their brothers and sisters and their own fathers and mothers; but do you know they have quit calling them fiappers? They do not call them fiappers anymore, they call them bungalow girls. Do you know why they call them bungalow girls? If you do not know why they call them bungalow girls, I will tell you. They call them bungalow girls because they are shingled on top, painted in front, and no upstairs.

[Laughter and applause.]

I learned to love those people out West, and I found that they have the same kind of problems that we in the South have, and the same kind of problems the people of the whole Nation have. They are looking to Congress to solve their problems, which to-day are menacing the very existence of our great Nation.

Mr. Speaker, the farmers and their families are pleading with us to help them in these trying hours, and I hope and pray that Congress may solve all our problems from the standpoint of the farmers and the workers of our country. I am most fully convinced that our people can never again become prosperous without these tremendous economic questions being approached and handled from the standpoint of just such people as I met on the banks of the Columbia River, at Pasco, Wash., and just such people as labor and till the soil down in my district in Georgia.

The best people in all the world live out in the country away from the big cities. Out in the woods the birds sing more sweetly, the flowers are prettier, and the sunrise and sunset are more entrancing. There the skies are bluer, the stars are brighter, and heaven and earth are nearer. Out there are men and women and children and God.

The late Senator Watson, of Georgia, expressed most truly the convictions of my very soul when he said:

There are thousands of devoted and absolutely admirable wives and mothers in our cities, in our towns, and in our villages, and it gives me pleasure and pride to testify to the fact; but if you ask me to carry you to the home of the true wife and the true mother—one who loses herself entirely in the existence of her husband and children, one who is the first to rise in the morning and the last to retire at night, one who is always at her post of duty, and the one who carries upon her shoulders the burdens of both husband and children, one who is the keeper of the household and the good angel of it; utterly unselfish, happy in making others happy, with no thought of fashionable pleasure, perfectly content in quiet home life in which she does nobody harm and everybody much good, taking as many thorns as she can from the pathway of her husband and strewing it with as many roses as possible, strengthening him by her inspiration as he goes forward to fight the battle of life, smoothing the pillow upon which he rests his tired head when he comes home; tenderly rearing the boys and girls who will in turn go away from the door seme day for the last time, the boy to become a good soldier in life's continuous warfare and the girl to become some ardent suitor's wife and to be to him what her mother has been to her father; and who, when all the toils are done and her strength is departing, will sit calmly in the doorway watching the setting sun with a serene smile upon her face and never a fear in her heart—ask me to find where this woman lives, where this type is to be found, and I will make a bee line for the country.

Mr. Speaker, I wish it was possible for all Members of Congress to know and appreciate the true worth of the people of the farm. I wish you knew how well they love their families and their homes, then you would understand why they are so anxious in these trying times to save their homes. Then you would more readily join with me in fighting their battles.

I am pleading for these people of the South, of the West, and of the whole Nation. Let us save them and we will save all our people. If they are happy, prosperous, and contented all our people of the whole Nation at once become the immediate beneficiaries of their success. I urge those who are charged with the responsibility of Members of Congress to get in closer touch with all our people of the whole country. I pray that you study the problems of the people of the South, the North, the East, and the West. Then you will be in position to more intelligently legislate for not only the people of the South but also for the people of the West and the entire Nation.

Mr. BOYLAN. Will the gentleman yield for a question? Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. I will be pleased to yield to my good friend the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BOYLAN. Last year the gentleman made a very interesting address about men who wear high collars, long-tailed coats, and spats. I want to ask the gentleman if he found any of that class in the great Northwest?

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. I did not find very many of the kind I was criticizing in the Northwest.

Mr. BOYLAN. Surely, the gentleman has no objection to men who wear long-tailed coats, high collars, and spats?

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. Not at all. I was not criticizing Members of Congress because of the cut of their wearing apparel. I was criticizing them for being on dress parade away from their posts of duty when they should be here in harness in the discharge of their duties as Members of Congress. My mentioning of their style of dress was only incidental to my line of discussion. Dress does not make the man but the man makes the dress. A man in overalls, earning an honest living, is a hundred times more attractive to me than a man with the most expensive garb away from his post of duty or accumulating great wealth by unfair and crooked methods.

Since mention has been made of my observations concerning Members of Congress, let me say just a few words about a very honorable group in the present Congress which will soon be extinct. I refer to those who are serving in this session but will retire at noon to-morrow. This is the last Congress where a group retiring because of a general election will serve in a regular session before the newly elected Members enter the actual service. Many of those who will retire to-morrow are most able and conscientious Members with most enviable records here. Those retiring are always much better qualified, have greater experience, and are better equipped generally than those coming in, and are just as able, fearless, and honest. Let me say just here that those of us who are going out of Congress are not "lame ducks," but we are veterans with a service-connected disability received in the front ranks of a major engagement of a great battle. [Laughter and applause.]

I saw the other day where a new Member was congratulating himself because he was able to find the Capitol Building so soon after he reached Washington. The trouble with new Members—and old Members, for that matter—is not in being able to find the Capitol, but in being able to find themselves after they get to the Capitol. Ofttimes during the next Congress they will earnestly ask, "Where am I at?" They will indeed be wise if only occasionally they know what they are doing and where they "are at." The prodigal son got along a whole lot better after he "came to himself."

There has been so much unfair criticism heaped on Members of Congress until I hesitate to criticize Congress lest I also may be thought to be unfair. I will, though, tell what has often been my reply when I was asked to tell what is being done in Congress. I have said, "I can answer your question by telling the story of the city man who, knowing nothing about farm life, bought a farm and moved to the country. After a few days, one evening he noticed that the geese were making considerable noise and decided that they were hungry, so he carried them a basket of dry corn shucks. When he came back some one asked him whether or not the geese ate the shucks, and he said, 'No; but they are talking about it.'" [Laughter and applause.]

There should be much more real work on our real prob- chairman of the House Committee on Banking and Curlems in Congress and much less talk. And yet so much of rency, while discussing the conference report on the bill to the seed we sow here falls on stony ground and so much of what we say reach ears that are deaf until it is most difficult to be either discreet in our choice of words or moderate in the amount of our language.

Then, again, the big interests, through the subsidized big newspapers, the radio, and the motion picture, wage such a bitter campaign against those in Congress who refuse to humbly do in accordance with their bidding until Members who are unable financially to buy newspaper space or otherwise defend their services in behalf of the common people are forced to defend themselves, their views, and their people on the floor of the House and in the Congressional Record.

Mr. Speaker, I am criticizing Congress not for talking in defense of the average citizen and in defense of what is believed best for all the people of the whole Nation, but for making so many pledges to the people which are never kept and never intended to be kept.

PROMISES TO THE FARMER

Promises to the farmer which are never kept probably constitute the most flagrant case of this kind of thing. In every race since I can remember the farmer has been promised every imaginable help by all candidates for Congress, and yet to date no real substantial farm relief plan has ever been adopted into law.

PERFORMANCE FOR THE BIG INTERESTS

Heretofore when Congress met it was immediately carried in the newspapers and talked freely everywhere that certain legislation in behalf of the big interests must be passed first and that farm legislation would be taken up in due season. First one measure and then another is passed for the big corporations and the friends of the farmers are urged to go along and are promised help for the farmers in the near future. Generally after the session has been in action for the big interests for several weeks, hearings are announced on farm legislation. Then much time is taken up hearing the lawyers and lobbyist of the big interests tell just how the farm problem can be solved so as to be well pleasing in the sight of the big corporations which exist solely and only by sucking the very lifeblood out of the farmers. Ofttimes not a single real honest-to-goodness farmer appears in behalf of the farmers, and even Members of Congress who represent the farmers are ofttimes limited in their presentation to five minutes each. Then it so often happens that near adjournment, when everybody is in a rush, the farm bill-if one comes up at all-is suddenly taken up under the suspension of the rules or under a special rule limiting the debate and probably cutting off all amendments, and, if it is passed at all, it is not a real farm relief bill, and gets to the President just before adjournment, so he can kill it by a veto after Congress has adjourned and made for itself an alibi in form, though not in fact.

PRESENT SESSION FOLLOWS SAME OLD TACTICS

This is precisely the tactics of the leaders in the present session. The only relief for the farmers passed by Congress so far is contained in the Smith cotton bill, which I favor and which passed only a few days ago. It should be enacted into law at the very earliest possible moment in order to help our farmers who grow cotton this year. Congress is to adjourn to-morrow, and this bill is still in the hands of President Hoover; and I am expecting that after Congress has adjourned news will be broadcast through the newspapers that President Hoover has refused to give his approval to this bill and in this way has prevented its becoming law.

HULL-WALCOTT MORTGAGE FORECLOSURE BILL

Another example of these kinds of tactics is to be found in the methods used in connection with the Hull-Walcott measure to prevent the turning of all of our farmers out of their homes by foreclosures. To my mind this is the best bill for the distressed farm debtors yet passed by the Senate during this session. It is now under the control of the leaders of the House, and yet it is not to pass. Just a few minutes ago, the gentleman from Alabama IMr. Steagall, chairman of the House Committee on Banking and Currency, while discussing the conference report on the bill to give more powers to the Federal land banks, yielded to me, and the following colloquy took place:

Mr. Lankford of Georgia. Some days ago there passed in the Senate S. 5369, known as the Hull-Walcott bill, providing for loans or advances by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for the purpose of securing the postponement of the foreclosure of certain mortgages for a period of two years, and for other purposes. Being much in favor of this measure, I wish to ask the gentleman whether or not there is a probability of the bill passing the House before adjournment at noon to-morrow.

Mr. STEAGALL. The Hull-Walcott bill was sent to the House only a day or two ago, without sufficient time remaining in which to give it proper consideration, and it will not be taken up at this session, so far as can be foreseen at this hour.

Thus it will be seen that the bill to give more powers and greater authority to the Federal land banks to foreclose farm mortgages, exploit the farmers, and actually destroy them as fully as was ever done by an invading army is to be passed by both Houses and be signed by the President and become law, but the Hull-Walcott measure, to stop mortgage foreclosures on the most reasonable plan yet suggested, is to be pigeonholed to death. Thus Congress is in a stampede to legislate for those that are destroying the farmers but can not be urged into passing laws in behalf of the farmers, and yet there are those who are asking, "What is the trouble with our country?"

CONGRESS HELPS FEDERAL LAND BANKS CRUCIFY FARMERS

It has always been so. The farmers get the promises; others get the service. If a good measure for the farmers passes one House, it either is amended to death later or is not finally passed or, if passed, is vetoed by the President. If a good measure for the farmer and the common people finally becomes law, then those who exploit the farmers immediately get control of it and operate it, so far as possible, for the big interests and so as to nullify all the good provisions of the law.

Those who always ride at the expense of the farmer seize the legislative machine which was set up for the farmers, push the farmer and his folks out of the car, put it in reverse gear, and back it over and kill the very folks it was intended to help—the farmers and the average citizens and their wives and children. This is exactly what is happening in the case of the Federal farm loan act, and it is happening with the approval of the leaders of Congress, who are passing over the bitter objections of a few of us laws giving more money and power to the Federal land banks and killing all moves to save the farmers from an awful destruction at the hands of those who are crucifying them.

Mr. Speaker, in spite of the many promises that have been made to the farmers, the country is in a more deplorable condition than ever before. There has been an overproduction of promises in behalf of the farmers and almost a total absence of really worthwhile legislation. For fear some one will challenge this statement, let me refer very briefly to at least four outstanding pieces of legislation passed and labeled as farm relief, to wit, the farm loan act, the intermediate credit bank act, the home loan bank act, and the Federal farm marketing act. Generally I charge that all these acts are failures, have done the farmer no real good, and in many instances have caused his ruin. I am willing to call the farmers themselves as my witnesses to prove not only this charge but also the others I shall make presently. Ask the farmers whether their condition has become worse or better since the enactment of these laws. Almost without exception they will declare that they are losing out in greater numbers than ever before, and in many cases as the direct result of the cold-blooded tactics of some of the institutions brought into being by the laws just mentioned. To be more specific, let me say that I find it much more difficult to secure the extension of a loan in default which is held by a Federal land bank than I do where it is held by a life insurance company or some private loan concern. Thus it is that these agencies set up to help the farmers are getting his land, mulcting him in unconscionable attorneys' fees, and, like heartless pirates, are turning him, his wife, and children out in the cold, cruel financial world without means of support.

The farm loan act was apparently designed to help others exploit the farmer rather than to be of real service to the farmer, and now during this awful depression the plundering of the farmer under this act is being carried to cruel and heartless extremes. What I have said about the Federal farm loan system is equally true of the intermediate credit bank system.

I shall not go into detail at this time. Suffice it to say that anyone who has attempted to secure money for the farmers through this system will corroborate what I say. Some of my good friends in Georgia are doing their best to make arrangements for some help for the farmers of my district. I know what they are up against and certainly wish them Godspeed.

About all these two systems do is permit the farmer to try to lift himself over the fence by pulling on his own boot straps, charge him exorbitantly for the experiment, and ruin him if he fails. I am sure some individual farmers have been helped by these systems but many more have not been helped or have been ruined. Generally these and all other so-called farm relief acts provide for the farmers' exploitation rather than his financial salvation. They help others to make money out of the farmer rather than help the farmer to get a square deal. Many of those who supported these measures acted in the best of faith but, as is always the case, the profiteer, the speculator, and those who consider the farmers as only cattle and to be handled and herded only for the money that can be obtained by their slaughter, were ever present by lobbyist, high-salaried counsel, and office seeker, to see that the bills were finally shaped to suit them and not for the best interest of the farmers of the country. Of course there is some good in these bills. The deadliest poison may be sugar coated. The passage of these and other loan measures by Congress are only repeated admissions that the farmer is not getting a square deal but is being robbed. Help the farmer get a fair price for his product and he won't need any farm-loan system. He will have all the money he needs and to spare.

Oh! If Congress would only enact a proper marketing act for the farmer and provide the proper monetization of farm products and farm lands, all else would be well with him. Banks have been closing all over the country. Why? Simply because the farmers and the common folks who keep the small banks going are losing out. To be more specific, many banks closed in my section during the last few years that would have kept open and been in good shape if the farmers had received a fair price for their cotton, tobacco. and other farm products.

The prices at which the farmers' tobacco is being takennot purchased-is only one illustration of the awful robbery that is being perpetrated. The farmer gets only a few cents for a pound of tobacco, which when manufactured into cigarettes sells for many dollars. The farmers and their families are being reduced to peasantry and abject slavery, while the manufacturers are making millions upon top of millions of profits.

What is the Government doing to help this situation? The truth about the situation is unbelievable. In 1929 the Government received in taxes from the manufactured products of tobacco $43 net every time the farmer got $28 gross. For the purpose of emphasis, let me repeat the Government got net $43 every time the farmer got $28 for all his labor, uses of his land and a farm property, fertilizer, and every other farm cost. Just think of it. The Government gets out of a tobacco crop a dozen times as much and even a hundred times as much as the farmer gets net. In fact, in most cases the Government and the manufacturers or exporters get all the profit while the producers are being ground into oblivion by a system of torture more cruel and inhuman than was ever inflicted on ancient peon or galley slave.

Much has been said about the Government subsidizing the farmer. This is not the case. In so far as the tobacco producer is concerned, the farmer is subsidizing the Government to the tune of approximately $500,000,000 a year. This money received by the Government each year out of the farmers' tobacco crop is the equivalent of the entire amount put up for use by the Federal Farm Board in handling the marketing of all farm products.

Street SE., here in Washington, across the churchyard of the Metropolitan Presbyterian Church to the doorway of marketing of all farm products.

Let me say that practically all the blame for bad measures is at the door of Congress. Practically all officials do their very best to administer the law and only fail because the law under which they operate is not good legislation. This is especially true of the Federal Farm Board act. That act does not contain a proper control of production and marketing and was bound to fail. The Farm Board officials are not to blame for this act. Congress is to blame for not passing a better act. The failure of Congress to pass as good legislation for the farmers and other average citizens as are passed for the big corporations is the greatest disappointment of my service here.

I get heart-rending appeals every day from farmers and other good citizens, pleading for relief. They want me to tell them how to manage so as to save their homes. I am forced to advise them that nothing has been done yet for their direct help.

I am absolutely convinced that there is and can be no permanent relief unless and until something of a substantial nature is done to save the homes of our people. Show me the individual who does not love his home, and I will show you a dangerous citizen. When we allow our people to lose their homes, we undermine the very foundations of our Government and our civilization. "Be it ever so humble, there is no place like home." The dearest places on earth to me are the places I have called home in Georgia, here in Washington at 1701 Euclid Street NW., and 3437 Oakwood Terrace NW., and 211 Fourth Street SE., where my family and I have lived. There is even an affection for the hotels where we often stop. I know this is true with me as to the old Kimball Hotel in Atlanta, the Pulaski in Savannah, the Oglethorpe in Brunswick, the Phoenix in Waycross, and the St. James here in Washington, where Mrs. Lankford and I always stopped prior to my coming to Congress. In future years many a heart will beat just a little faster as men and women pass the sites here in Washington where the St. James once stood in what is now Constitution Avenue and the small triangle between this avenue and Pennsylvania Avenue and Sixth Street NW., and sites of the old Metropolitan Hotel, where Lincoln stopped; the National, where Alexander H. Stephens, of Georgia, lived and Henry Clay died; and the old Pennsylvania Railroad Depot, where Garfield was assassinated-all grouped in close proximity to each other where once was the business center of the Nation's Capital.

Mr. Speaker, just as we love these spots we once called home so our people love the homes which are now being ruthlessly torn from them. The very highest and greatest duty of Congress to-day is to stop the awful barbaric sacrifice of the homes of our people which is now taking place on every hand. We must save our homes if we save our civilization and our Nation. By the use of the word "homes" I do not mean the palaces of the rich nor the rented tenements of the criminal class of the crowded cities—I mean the small home of the country and city where fathers and mothers live and rear their children to become good men and women, such as builded our Republic, maintain it now, and must preserve it, if it is to endure.

Better a thousand times save our homes and the honest sturdy men and women of these homes and lose all the banks and monopolies than save the great corporations and lose the homes of our Nation-homes and good people build banks and wealth; but ofttimes many of these, as is now the case, destroy our people and our homes. In saving our homes we save all; in losing our homes we lose all. True patriotism is not the love alone of hills or valleys or fields or forests or plains or mountains or sea or sky but is the love of fathers and mothers and their children. True legislation is in behalf of fathers and mothers and their children. True legislation is not for the banks nor the rich who keep their money there, but for the people and to help them secure food and clothing and shelter and enjoy the blessing of our civilization as free American citizens. Many a time I have looked from the window of my room at 211 Fourth Street SE., here in Washington, across the churchyard of the Metropolitan Presbyterian Church to the doorway of 129 Fourth Street, at northwest corner of B and Fourth Streets SE., where the late Senator Thomas E. Watson lived while serving his first and only term in this House, and received a new inspiration as I remembered his own words:

I do no speak for the lordly magnates of class legislation. I do not speak for those who for 100 years have stood at the doorways of national legislation begging for special favors. No! The men whose cause I would plead before the bar of American public opinion are chiefly those who toil in the hundreds of different places of industry and who have never lifted their voices to ask anything of this Government except just laws and honest administration. They are the men of the mine, the mill, the shop, and the field. They are the obscure toilers who in time of peace send pulsing through the veins of commerce the rich blood of prosperity. They are the men who in time of war spring into the battle line at the tap of the drum and with patient feet follow the march and with fearless heart make the charge upon which is based and builded the world-wide fame of your commanders, to whom you rear monuments in the open places of your cities.

I never visit the home of Washington at Mount Vernon without getting a new inspiration of service to people and of love of folks. I shall always remember the patriotic thrill which was so evident on the face of all one afternoon a few years ago when a large throng of people, including Mrs. Lankford, our children, Chester, Cecil, and Laura, and Miss Eula Walden, now Mrs. Hepner, and myself, saw General Foch, the great French general of the World War, place a wreath of flowers on the tomb of Gen. George Washington.

Mr. Speaker, these men were great because they rendered a great, unselfish service to their fellow men. They lived and fought and sacrificed for fathers and mothers and their children. The great cause of the present economic troubles is selfishness and can only be overcome by a new baptism of unselfish patriotism and determined service of all our people. Too many believe that economy is the method of getting everything for self, regardless of what happens to others.

Mr. Speaker, I was very much interested in the address of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Keller] delivered several minutes ago, to-day. I most heartily approve most of what he said. He is absolutely right about child labor. Children should be in school and not slaves in our factories. My good friend, Mr. Keller, is right about old-age pensions, money, and other matters too numerous to mention now. I hope every Member, both of this and the next Congress, who did not hear his remarks will read them.

Now, just a few more words about our present economic struggle. Overcentralization of financial and political power in a few individuals is the cause of our awful economic condition; contains the cause which we must overcome to find our way out and will be the cause of our Nation's downfall unless we can overcome and nullify its blighting effects. Congress has been legislating entirely too much for the monopolies, regardless of what happens to the private citizens; too much for the big railroads, regardless of what happens to the smaller ones and the employees; too much for the big international banks with enormous deposits, regardless of what happens to the smaller national banks, the State banks, the depositors, or the general public.

The leaders of the present Congress have stampeded through moratoriums for foreign nations, and now for the big banks, but have blocked all efforts to secure a moratorium for the average citizen or to stop the foreclosure of farm mortgages. Over the protest of many of us greater and still greater power has been given to the big banks to inflate or deflate the currency just as suits their selfish purpose. Congress should and must, if we are to save our Nation, exercise its constitutional right to coin money, and issue currency and regulate the value thereof.

No amount of inflation of the currency by the big banks will do us any good if the money is simply issued and stored away. It must be put into actual circulation, giving employment, helping the prices of farm products, and restoring prosperity. And yet this more or less useless kind of expansion of the currency is very profitable to the big bankers and very costly to the taxpayers. It often does much more several billion dollars more currency by authority of the big bankers, let us see briefly just what can be done. A big New York banker can take a billion dollars in currency, come to Washington, buy a billion dollars' worth of 3 per cent Government bonds, leave them in the Treasury for a billion dollars of currency, and carry back to New York exactly the same amount of money he brought and get this $30,000,000 per year interest out of the taxpayers for the trip. Thus the banker gets net for his two or three hours' trip about $1 out of every voter in the United States. Right here is our main trouble. This is why it is so hard to balance the Budget and why the big international banks are so anxious for big bond issues and for the Budget to be balanced. They want money squeezed out of the World War veterans, out of the farmers, out of the poorest of the poor to balance the Budget and pay them this graft for making a "racket" out of the issuance and control of our currency. They say the way to solve our problems is to give them more of this kind of power. I will be blamed if I believe it!

Now, let me suggest how to put new money into circulation so it will help everybody and at the same time go so far toward balancing the Budget as to make unnecessary any unusual tax or burden on the people. This is the plan: Eliminate all this interest on bonds which are held in the Treasury as the basis of currency, monetize farm products and farm lands, and inflate the currency sufficiently to pay off or adjust all farm loans and retire by the issuance of interest-free currency as soon as possible all interest-bearing Government bonds, and do not issue any more.

WHY ISSUE GOVERNMENT BONDS?

Why not the Government issue interest-free currency in the first instance rather than issue and sell Government bonds, pay interest on the bonds to the banks out of the taxpayers' money, and then let the banks use these identical bonds as the basis on which to issue interest-free money to the banks to loan to the taxpayers at a high rate of interest? To ask the question answers it. The big bankers insist on this, because it gives them double interest on their money, makes the taxpayers pay them interest on the bonds, and makes the public pay interest on the same money as currency, and gives the bankers the tremendous power of inflation, deflation, and control of the currency and of all property values.

When the taxpayer, in order to pay taxes, borrows money from one of these banks he pays interest on the loan to the bank to get money to help balance the Federal Budget, and thus when he pays his taxes pays another interest to the bank on the same money.

BONDS IMPAIR OUR CREDIT MORE THAN CURRENCY

Currency based on Government bonds has no security back of it except the naked promise of the Government to pay, and yet this scheme costs the Government just exactly the amount of the annual interest on the bonds more than the issuance of an equivalent amount of currency in the first instance.

FEDERAL BONDS RETARD CIRCULATION

The sale of Government bonds takes money out of the channels of commerce, increases the public debt more than the issuance of currency, increases the cost of government and—if the bonds are used as the basis of currency—gives to the big banks a further stranglehold on the economic affairs of the Nation.

MONETIZATION OF FARM PRODUCTS

Now, just a few words about the monetization of farm products and other property. In fact, they are already monetized for the benefit of the big banks but not for the producers of these products or the millions of owners of ordinary property or for State banks or to any considerable extent for small national banks. The big national banks can take notes and other discountable paper, put them up with the Federal reserve banks and the Federal reserve banks can issue currency on this collateral. Why should this kind of security be the basis for currency for the Federal reserve banks but not for the farmer, not for the manufacturer, not for the ordinary property owner, harm than good. Since there is talk of authority to issue several billion dollars more currency by authority of the big bankers, let us see briefly just what can be done. A big New York banker can take a billion dollars in currency, come to Washington, buy a billion dollars' worth of 3 per cent Government bonds, leave them in the Treasury for a life insurance company, and not for small banks? Why should gilt-edge first liens on farm produce or farm land be sufficient base for interest-free currency for the big bankers but not for the farmer, not for the individual citizen, not for the merchant or manufacturer, not for the long-term loan company, not for the life insurance company, and not for small banks?

Again, asking the question answers it. Under this scheme the big banks get interest they ought not to get, and the public pays interest it ought not to pay, and the big banks get a complete monopoly in the inflation, deflation, and control of the currency and prices of the property of the Nation. The power to issue currency and regulate the value of the same ought not to be farmed out in any such style.

FARM LANDS AS CURRENCY BASIS

Let us visualize the beneficient effects of the monetization of farm lands, so as to make farm mortgages more liquid. If it is insisted that Government bonds were to be the basis for the issuance of currency, then let farmers or other holders of farm mortgages file gilt-edge, first-lien farm mortgages with the Secretary of the Treasury for an equivalent amount of Government bonds, with same maturity and the same rate of interest so the interest on one exactly pays the interest on the other. Then be as fair to the farmer as to the big banker and let the farmer file his Government bonds in the United States Treasury as the basis for the issuance to the farmer of the equivalent amount of interest-free currency.

FARM-SECURED BONDS MUCH BETTER

These farm-land-secured Government bonds would be much better basis for currency than ordinary bonds or other security now used. The money issued in this way would cost the taxpayers nothing—the interest on the bond base being paid by the interest on the farm mortgages—would help all holders of farm liens and all farm debtors, would put an abundant and sufficient amount of new currency into circulation and enable the farmers to settle their long-term loans without the loss of their homes and in a manner satisfactory to all concerned.

MONETIZATION OF WAREHOUSE RECEIPTS

Why levy heavy taxes on the people or issue and sell bonds to raise money to loan the farmers on their warehouse receipts? Why not monetize farm products and save interest for the farmers, save the collection of excessive taxes out of the people, help balance the Budget, to economize, and, if necessary, put a flood of new money into active circulation. This would be real farm relief. This would help us to find the way out of the depression.

CONTRACT SYSTEM OF FARM RELIEF

I have recently said so much about farm relief until I shall now only briefly mention my contract plan of farm relief. As I have repeatedly stated, with the monetization of farm products would come a complete method of raising interest-free money to finance the farmers in all their activities, whether as individuals or in a cooperative capacity. This would furnish at all times a flexible currency, commensurate with the economic needs of the Nation.

AGRICULTURAL ECONOMIC EQUALITY

Agriculture can never be put on a parity with other enterprises until the farmer is enabled to name the prices of what he sells as fully as others name the prices of what they sell to the farmer.

This can never be done until the farmers are enabled to control their production and marketing, thus becoming able, within reasonable limits, to control, determine, and fix the prices of the farm products which they offer for sale. This in turn can only be done, as I see it, by a voluntary contract system of controlling production and marketing along the lines of my bill for this purpose and as repeatedly explained by me on this floor.

REAL FARM RELIEF

To my mind real relief to the farmers would embrace a proper contract system of controlling production, marketing, and prices; the monetization for the farmers and others—not the big bankers only—of farm products and farm lands; an amendment to the Federal Constitution providing for the exemption from all taxes of a reasonable amount of personal and real property for home purposes; and generally the freeing of the farmers from the strangle hold of bureaus, boards, and other State and Federal agencies which are now sucking the very life blood out of the farmer and the people generally. Farm legislation—and all legislation for that matter—must be most carefully worded so as to make clear and definite the rights of all and so as to prevent the more powerful from so construing the law and manipulating it as to make it an engine of tyranny and oppression in the hands of the rich and the mighty. I had this especially in mind when I drew my bill providing for a contract system of farm relief.

TEMPORARY REMEDIES

Of course there are scores of most important matters I would like to discuss now, such as the railroads, the refinancing of all the indebtedness of our people, taxation and tariff, and so forth, and so on. I have discussed these most fully heretofore and shall not have time to discuss them more in detail at this time. My main thought just now is to present rather fully the evil effects of our monetary system as manipulated by the big bankers.

HONEST BANKERS AND BANKS

I am making my fight against crooked bankers and in behalf of honest bankers and banks. I would we could secure the reopening of the thousands of small honest banks that have recently been closed by the unlawful and crooked manipulations of the very crowd now getting help. I hope we can prevent any more of these small banks closing. It is no sign of dishonesty in these times for a bank to close or for a man not to be able to meet his financial obligations. Too often the honest bank closes and those which are getting millions of loot from the pockets of the poor remain open. Every benefit extended to the big international banks should be extended to all banks and to all the people. I hope the small national banks and the State banks are accorded the same emergency relief by the next Congress as is granted to the larger banks. Congress is helping the big crowd at the expense of the poor. Relief should be granted to the small banker, the small business man, and the average citizen first. Such help will inure to the benefit of all.

J. P. CARTER, NAYLOR, GA.

I know of no better illustration of what I have just been saying than is found in the case of Mr. J. P. Carter, of Naylor, Ga., in my district. A few years ago Mr. Carter, as the president of a small bank in his home town, found it in a failing condition. He could have easily added to his fortune by manipulations within the law and left his friends and depositors to suffer all the loss. But, on the contrary, he voluntarily mortgaged his most valuable properties to pay off all his depositors in full. Now he finds it difficult to save this property because of the lien voluntarily placed on it by him to pay in full deposits for which he was not legally liable and his Government will not in any way help him to save his life's earnings. There is plenty of real aid for the big banks, the big corporations, but none for such honest bankers and men as J. P. Carter.

There are millions of honest men and women all over our country who are begging for direct Federal aid, whose earnest appeals have been refused and whose Representatives in Congress have been abused and ridiculed for their appeals in their behalf, while every agency of our Government is most active in behalf of the big, rich class and in an all-powerful financial endeavor to save the big corporations regardless of the cost to the splendid, sturdy, average citizen of our Nation. All aid offered so far to the farmer, the laborer, the individual citizen or the small corporation is too indirect, too expensive, too involved, and enmeshed in too much red tape, and is entirely too speculative and too difficult and burdensome to secure to be of any real value to the average citizen. This kind of so-called aid requires the farmer or average citizen to sell his birthright and very soul for a mess of pottage. Real aid such as the monetization of farm lands and farm products would help all and save our Nation. This alone if it had been in effect years ago would have saved Mr. J. P. Carter from loss in the first instance, and would even now save him and millions more like him if put into force before it is too late.

MOST VITAL SUBJECT

Currency control is the most important subject before Congress to-day and I have said much more at this time than I anticipated and am leaving much unsaid I would like to say.

I do though desire to briefly discuss the issuance of currency in payment of the adjusted compensation due the veterans of the World War. Why not issue to the Director of the Veterans' Administration enough Government bondsif Government bonds are to be the basis of currency—to pay the entire balance due the veterans as adjusted compensation, let the bonds be filed back in the Treasury-just as the banker does-as the basis for an equal amount of interest-free currency to pay the veterans in full? This will inflate the currency, put all the new money in active circulation, and save for the taxpayers about $50,000,000 interest received by big bankers for similar issues for their own use. This would not increase taxes. This would help balance the Budget. This would be real economy. The big bankers do not want this, though; they want all the blood money they have and every additional penny they can squeeze out of an impoverished people. They want more and yet more power to issue and control all currency, to raise or lower all prices of all farm produce, other products, and all property as they wish, and to make or break all lesser banks and corporations which do not meet their approval and the elimination of which will serve their selfish purposes.

Now, it seems to be the purpose of the big banks, after all the small banks shall have been eliminated, after all the deposits of the poorer and middle class of people have been lost, and after there are left only a few very large banks with principally rich depositors, to force a sales tax on the poorest of the poor and those who have already lost all their deposits, and thus raise a fund to guarantee the deposits of the rich in the big banks which have broken the smaller ones, caused the loss of billions of deposits and precipitated the present depression. I wonder why these international bankers did not favor a deposit guaranty law a few years ago to protect all the depositors in all the banks then in existence, with the funds for this purpose to be raised by big corporation taxes, big income taxes, and inheritance and estate taxes on the tremendous fortunes of decedents? I understand their selfish motive and the American people are becoming aware of their criminal designs.

Mr. Speaker, I fear, as a child dreads the dark, the tremendous centralization and consolidation of banks, railroads, and other monopolies, with the attendant destruction of smaller banks, smaller railroads, smaller corporations, and private enterprise and human rights—all of which evidently are soon to take place with additional nation-wide awful devastation in their wake.

I pray that an all-wise God may lead us all to bring these matters to a proper conclusion before it is forever too late. Let us legislate for and serve, not the big corporations nor any special group, but all the people.

Mr. Speaker, before the New House Office Building was erected I could stand in my office at room 301, House Office Building, and see the old home of Gen. Robert E. Lee, across the Potomac at Arlington. Several times just at sunset, I have stood at my office windows and beheld entrancing views of the Virginia hills of the southland and the Nation's Capital, of the Washington Memorial, the Lincoln Memorial, the home of Robert E. Lee, and of a onceseparated, but now reunited imperishable country and Nation of one powerful people and one flag of everlasting glory. Emblazoned across the western sky were the glories of the setting sun, stretching from the hills of Virginia of the southland, and connecting with the lands of those who remained with the Union, were white streaks of clouds with the blue of the sky between. As the sun sank from view some of the streaks of cloud became red and I beheld the red, the white, and the blue. Then the stars came out and the Washington Monument became the flagstaff of the glorious flag of my country, builded by the great I Am, of cloud and sky and star and sunset, and hanging over the North and the South, over the Memorial of Lincoln and the home of Lee, waving from the Memorial of Washington and over the Capital of a mighty and free, reunited people.

Mr. Speaker, as I gazed, spellbound, upon this scene I pledged anew my loyalty to the people of the South and the North, the rich and the poor, those now living and generations yet unborn. And, let us all forget selfishness and sectionalism and legislate for all our people of the present and future everywhere and of every station in life.

Let us not legislate for the big bankers and forget the smaller bankers, the depositors, and the masses of our people. With all my being I plead with Members of the next Congress not to grant a moratorium to the big banks of the country and then leave to be crucified, without a moratorium or any real Federal assistance, the smaller national banks, the State banks, the small depositors in all banks, those who have already lost their all, and the great masses of our people in all walks of life. For our Nation's sake and for God's sake do not forget the farmer, who is being driven from his home by cruel foreclosure proceedings. Remember the railroads, the factories, the banks, and all great public utilities—yes—but remember that the men and women and children who work for these and are served by these are a million times more important than all of these. Let us remember and never forget that the Member of Congress is a traitor to his Nation who legislates only for the president and directors of the corporation and forgets the widow and the orphan and the man in overalls and his folks. Balance the Federal Budget-yesbut do not balance it by further unbalancing the budget of those who are now starving, freezing, and homeless. Above all else be true to those who in time of peace and time of war have been true to our Nation; be true to the farmers, the veterans of all wars, and those everywhere who earn their living by honest toil. Let us in Congress and out of Congress fight to preserve our great citizenship by saving the homes of the people, enabling them to make an honest living and by preserving our great free institutions. If we are to save our Nation we must not only solve our economic problems but must preserve the very foundations on which our Nation was builded-love of liberty, love of people, and faith in God.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that Christianity is the foundation of our national existence and that an assault upon the Bible or any of its teachings is a thrust at all we hold near and dear, and is an effort to undermine and destroy the great principles and noble institutions which constitute our country's greatness and which, through the ages, were gained and established by brave, patriotic, and divinely led men and women, at the sacrifice of their own lives.

I believe that our Nation can never be greater than our citizenship; our citizenship never greater than our homes; our homes never greater than the children reared therein; and our children, who are to preserve this Nation if it is to endure, can never be greater than is the faith of their fathers and mothers in God and in the teachings of His word.

I believe that our national life, our every constitutional right, our people's welfare, our Christian civilization, our great institutions, our great reverence and love for the noble men and women of the past, our every patriotic impulse and motive, our respect for the Bible, our observance of its teachings, our regard and observance of law and order, our belief in God and our love for Him as our Father Almighty are so inseparably connected that an assault upon either is an effort to destroy all.

I believe that the example of flagrant disrespect of law in the Nation's Capital and elsewhere in the States and the turning away from God now sponsored by too many for selfish purposes are more insidious and more dangerous to our Nation and all the people thereof than the invasion of a foreign army or the bombardment of a hostile fleet.

May the peoples of all the earth justly expect to find in America the highest and best of which a self-governing people are capable and may the light of national greatness and purity and godly trust and love shining from this Nation encompass the earth.

May we oppose, as we would a mighty hostile army, all efforts to break down the morals of our people or to destroy our spiritual ideals or to undermine our faith in the Supreme Architect of the universe. Let us and all our people with the poet see, feel, and know that—

Soon as the evening shades prevail, The moon takes up the wondrous tale, And nightly to the listening earth Repeats the story of her birth;

While all the stars that round her burn, And all the planets in their turn, Confirm the tidings as they roll, And spread the truth from pole to pole.

What though, in solemn silence, all Move round the dark terrestial ball? What though no real voice or sound Amid their radiant orbs be found?

In Reason's ear they all rejoice, And utter forth a glorious voice, Forever singing, as they shine, "The hand that made us is divine!"

Mr. Speaker, let us remember that our Nation can not endure if we allow the destruction of the good influence of our churches, our schools, and our homes. To gain all financially and lose all spiritually and morally can only mean our national decay and ruin.

If we are to remain capable of self-government, as a people and as legislators we must live and act more for the common good and not for self, and much less because of selfish political and financial motives.

Let us as officials and as citizens act and live a life of unselfish service of others and the good we do will come back a thousandfold to bless and honor us and our posterity forever. Serve not the great and the mighty, but the helpless and the innocent. Serve children and their fathers and mothers of all eternity by giving them the best laws ever enacted by men. Let us help perfect the greatest Nation of the noblest people since the beginning of time—an imperishable Nation, with an indestructible liberty as the common heritage of all mankind beneath our flag. May a little child lead us as its upturned face pleads for the very best possible laws and government for all the people of the present and all the future and urges us to do and to die for it, for its brothers and sisters, and for its father and mother.

RECESS

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House may stand in recess, subject to the call of the Speaker, the call to be preceded by the ringing of the bells 15 minutes before the House reconvenes.

Mr. SNELL. Are we to understand that the ringing of the bells may occur at 7 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. Let the Chair say that the information of the Chair is that probably they will not be back before 7 o'clock with the deficiency bill. We have to send that bill to conference. When the bells are rung and we come back at 7 o'clock, unless some good reason can be given, the Chair is going to recognize the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Millian] to take up the omnibus bridge bill at that time so as to dispose of the two matters together.

Mr. SNELL. Why not make a definite arrangement to meet at 7 o'clock or 7.30?

The SPEAKER. Notice will be given in advance by the ringing of the bells.

Mr. BLANTON. Outside of that, Mr. Speaker, are we to understand there will be no other legislative matters brought up?

The SPEAKER. No other legislative matters except those that may be taken up by unanimous consent. Some question may come up where the Chair may want to recognize some one to submit a unanimous-consent request.

Mr. BLANTON. There are some bills that some of us have been opposed to for a long time. I would not want them called up by unanimous consent when I am in conference on an appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. Nothing of a controversial nature will be taken up.

ATLANTIC GULF CANAL-EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, from the time the first survey was authorized for a canal across south Georgia and north Florida to connect the Atlantic with the Gulf, more than 50 years ago, to the present moment the numerous advocates of this project have worked long and diligently to bring it to a successful fruition. It would require the writing of a book to tell of the splendid, unselfish service in behalf of the canal by hundreds of good men and women, led by such noble citizens as the late Dr. W. M. Folks, of Waycross, Ga., and the late Hon. S. C. Townsend and his most excellent wife, of St. Marys, Ga. Probably no one at this time is more devotedly and ably working for this canal than Mrs. Townsend, all honor to her.

The Georgia Canal Commission are serving without pay and have unselfishly worked for the construction of the canal, and I sincerely thank them and their general counsel, Mr. Hallins N. Randolph, of Atlanta, Ga., for the most valuable assistance which they have given me in my efforts to bring this project to a successful conclusion. I feel that success is just ahead, and I shall not quit so long as there remains a single move which I can make in furtherance of the construction of this proposed canal. Much progress in the way of surveys has already been made, and the canal should actually be constructed in the next four or five years. No one who has not kept up closely with the details of the campaign for this canal has any idea just how valuable has been the service of Mr. Randolph in behalf of

Mr. Speaker, the canal commission in December, 1929, appointed Mr. Randolph as its general counsel. He had been general counsel of the Federal Reserve Bank of Atlanta since its organization in 1914; also counsel for the War Finance Corporation in Georgia and Florida; also for the Federal Intermediate Credit Bank of New Orleans, the Joint-Stock Land Bank of Atlanta, and practically all of the United States Treasury activities in the Southeast for many years. He was also one of the counsel in connection with the transfer of the Cape Cod Canal to the United States Government and was one of the counsel of the Boulder Dam development, as well as numerous other projects and concerns, not only in the South but throughout the country. It was considered that he particularly possessed the ability and experience necessary to bring the proposed project to a successful consummation, and he was directed to take practically entire charge of the matter. subject to the direction and approval of the commission

Mr. Randolph has been untiring in his efforts for the commission ever since, with the result that the rivers and harbors act of 1931 contained a provision directing the United States Board of Engineers to make a survey of the canal route and report to Congress; and the Federal relief act of June, 1932, made canal corporations or projects eligible for loans from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. He procured resolutions to be passed by legislatures, chambers of commerce, and other like civic bodies, all strongly indorsing the proposed canal. Also, he has interviewed and interested very numerous prominent business and professional men throughout the entire country in the proposed canal, including ex-President Hoover and President Roosevelt, then Governor of the State of New York. He has written numerous articles on the subject and made speeches with reference thereto from coast to coast and from Canada to the Gulf. Not the least among Mr. Randolph's accomplishments in behalf of the proposed canal was the thorough research work he did in the records of the War and other departments of the Government, gathering together the many documents and reports which in prior years had been prepared and filed in the several departments, and which had in some instances remained undisturbed for wellnigh a century.

As a result of these efforts and work by Mr. Randolph, the proposed canal project is now well known throughout the entire country, and its vast army of friends and supporters are confident that it will in due time become an accomplished fact.

And, lastly, it is my pleasure to be able to state that Mr. Randolph has rendered all these numerous and exceedingly valuable services without any compensation whatever.

LEAVE OF ARSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. Lewis, to-day, on account of illness.

The SPEAKER. The House will stand in recess subject to the call of the Chair.

Accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 38 minutes p. m.) the House stood in recess to meet at the call of the Chair.

AFTER THE RECESS

The recess having expired (at 7 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.), the House was called to order by the Speaker.

OMNIBUS BRIDGE BILL

Mr. MILLIGAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table and consider the bill (S. 7501) to authorize the construction of certain bridges and to extend the times for commencing and/or completing the construction of other bridges over the navigable waters of the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?
Mr. SCHAFER. Reserving the right to object, is the toll bridge over Great Falls in this bridge bill?

Mr. MILLIGAN. No. Mr. SCHAFER. And it will not be added?

Mr. MILLIGAN. No.

The Clerk began reading the bill.

Mr. MILLIGAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the bill be dispensed with.

Mr. SCHAFER. I object.

The Clerk continued the reading of the bill.

Mr. MILLIGAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that it be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, may the Clerk read the subtitles?

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Clerk read the subtitles to the bill.

The bill is as follows:

An act to authorize the construction of certain bridges and to extend the times for commencing and/or completing the con-struction of other bridges over the navigable waters of the United States

Be it enacted, etc .-

DELAWARE RIVER AT BUSHKILL, PA.

SECTION 1. (a) That in order to facilitate interstate commerce. improve the postal service, and provide for military and other purposes the Bushkill Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, be, and is hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Delaware River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near Bushkill, Pa., in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to resultant the construction of bridge construction of the second provisions of to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906, and subject to the condition and limitations contained in this act.

(b) There is hereby conferred upon the Bushkill Bridge Co., its accessors and assigns, all such rights and powers to enter upon lands and to acquire, condemn, occupy, possess, and use real estate and other property needed for the location, construction, operation, and maintenance of such bridge and its approaches as operation, and maintenance of such bridge and its approaches as are possessed by railroad corporations for railroad purposes or by bridge corporations for bridge purposes in the State in which such real estate or other property is situated, upon making just compensation therefor, to be ascertained and paid according to the laws of such State, and the proceedings therefor shall be the same as in the condemnation or expropriation of property for public purposes in such State.

(c) The said Bushkill Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, is hereby authorized to fix and charge tolls for transit over such bridge, and the rates of toll so fixed shall be the legal rates until changed by the Secretary of War under the authority contained in the act of March 23, 1906.

(d) After the completion of such bridge, as determined by the the act of March 23, 1906.

(d) After the completion of such bridge, as determined by the Secretary of War, either the State of Pennsylvania, the State of New Jersey, any public agency or political subdivision of either of such States, within or adjoining which any part of such bridge is located, or any two or more of them jointly, may at any time acquire and take over all right, title, and interest in such bridge and its approaches, and any interest in real property necessary therefor, by purchase or by condemnation or expropriation, in accordance with the laws of either of such States governing the acquisition of private property for public purposes by condemnation or expropriation. If at any time after the expiration of five years after the completion of such bridge the same is acquired by condemnation or expropriation, the amount of damages or compensation to be allowed shall not include good will, going value, or prospective revenues or profits, but shall be limited to the sum of (1) the actual cost of constructing such bridge and its approaches, less a reasonable deduction for actual depreciation in value; (2) the actual cost of acquiring such interests in and its approaches, less a reasonable deduction for actual depreciation in value; (2) the actual cost of acquiring such interests in real property; (3) actual financing and promotion costs, not to exceed 10 per cent of the sum of the cost of constructing the bridge and its approaches and acquiring such interests in real property; and (4) actual expenditures for necessary improvements.

(e) If such bridge shall at any time be taken over or acquired by the States or public agencies or political subdivisions thereof, or by either of them, as provided in section 4 of this act, and if tolls are thereafter charged for the use thereof, the rates of toll shall be so adjusted as to provide a fund sufficient to pay for the reasonable cost of maintaining, repairing, and operating the bridge and its approaches under economical management, and to shall be so adjusted as to provide a fund sufficient to pay for the reasonable cost of maintaining, repairing, and operating the bridge and its approaches under economical management, and to provide a sinking fund sufficient to amortize the amount paid therefor, including reasonable interest and financing cost, as soon as possible under reasonable charges, but within a period of not to exceed 20 years from the date of acquiring the same. After a sinking fund sufficient for such amortization shall have been so provided, such bridge shall thereafter be maintained and operated free of tolls, or the rates of toll shall thereafter be so adjusted as to provide a fund of not to exceed the amount necessary for the proper maintenance, repair, and operation of the bridge and its approaches under economical management. An accurate record of the amount paid for acquiring the bridge and its approaches, the actual expenditures for maintaining, repairing, and operating the same and of the daily tolls collected, shall be kept and shall be available for the information of all persons interested.

(f) The Bushkill Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, shall within 90 days after the completion of such bridge file with the Secretary of War and with the highway departments of the States of Pennsylvania and New Jersey a sworn itemized statement showing the actual original cost of constructing the bridge and its approaches, the actual cost of acquiring any interest in real property necessary therefor, and the actual financing and promotion costs. The Secretary of War may, and upon request of the highway department of either of such States shall, at any time within three years after the completion of such bridge, investigate such costs and determine the accuracy and reasonableness of the costs alleged in the statement of costs so filed, and shall make a finding of the actual and reasonable costs of constructing, financing, and promoting such bridge; for the purpose of such investigation the said Bushkill Bridge Co., its successors a finding of the actual and reasonable costs of constructing, financing, and promoting such bridge; for the purpose of such investigation the said Bushkill Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, shall make available all of its records in connection with the construction, financing, and promotion thereof. The findings of the Secretary of War as to the reasonable costs of the construction, financing, and promotion of the bridge shall be conclusive for the purposes mentioned in section 4 of this act, subject only to review in a court of equity for fraud or gross mistake.

(g) The right to sell, assign, transfer, and mortgage all the rights, powers, and privileges conferred by this act is hereby granted to the Bushkill Bridge Co., its successors and assigns; and any corporation to which or any person to whom such rights, powers, and privileges may be sold, assigned, or transferred, or who shall acquire the same by mortgage foreclosure or otherwise, is hereby authorized and empowered to exercise the same as fully as though conferred herein directly upon such corporation or person.

SEC. 16. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

expressly reserved.

Mr. MILLIGAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Cochran].

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, in this omnibus bridge bill is a bill I introduced to construct a railroad approach to a bridge over the Mississippi River at St. Louis. The city of St. Louis has spent over $10,000,000 on this bridge so that anybody in the United States can go over it free of tolls.

They are now proposing to make another railroad approach to that bridge. That bill I introduced.

The Members of the House all know my objection to toll bridges. If I thought for a minute that any of these bills would result in the construction of a toll bridge, I would oppose it. I know that the people in this country have been advised of the situation in reference to toll bridges and they will not buy the bonds, and these bridges can not be constructed unless you sell bonds.

Starting at Cairo, Ill., and going north on the Mississippi River, Congress gave permission for the construction of bridges at Cairo; 1 at Chain of Rocks, near St. Louis; 1 at Cape Girardeau; 1 at Bellefontaine, Mo.; 1 at Alton, Ill.; 1 at Louisiana, Mo.; 1 at Hannibal, Mo.; and another one north of that.

What has happened? Some $30,000,000 have been invested in the construction of these bridges, and the bonds were sold to the public at par value of $100. If there is any gentleman in the House who wants any of these bonds, I can buy them for him for $2.

The question of necessity does not enter into the introduction of bridge bills. It is a question of convenience that causes a Member of this House to offer one of these bills.

There is one bill in here that provides for the construction of a bridge over the Mississippi River, and I have in my office the evidence that there is now a ferry operating across the river at that particular point. At no time since the ferry has been placed in operation has more than 12 cars passed over the river in 24 hours.

Think of building a bridge over the great Mississippi River for the purpose of taking care of 12 automobiles a day, when you can not construct the bridge for less than $2,500,000. As I said before, there is no doubt in my mind that not one of these toll bridges will ever be constructed.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. RICH. If that is the case, how are the bridges going to be financed?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I say they are not going to be financed, because the people will not buy the bonds, and the bridge promoters will be back here again asking you to grant another extension of time for the construction of the same bridge.

Mr. RICH. If there is no greater need than what the gentleman speaks of for these bridges, why should we pass the

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. You can not stop it. can pass it or not, as you like. You can defeat my bill if you wish, but, as it is not in the toll-bridge class, I will be back again and have it passed eventually. It is a meritorious project.

Mr. RICH. Does the gentleman think that is a good thing to do?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I am just telling what the situation is. I have opposed these bridges for eight years on the floor of this House. If this bill goes to a record vote I will vote against it, even though my bill is included. It should not be in this bill. It is simply a bait to get me to drop my opposition to toll bridges, but I will not bite.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. Is the gentleman's bridge bill which is in this omnibus bill a good one, and, therefore, an exception to the rule?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. It provides for the city of St. Louis to construct a railroad approach to a free bridge. I leave it to the gentleman to decide if it is good or bad.

Mr. SCHAFER. Oh, you will have plenty of money after the Fourth of July, for they will be able to sell beer in St. Louis after the Fourth of July.

Louis after the Fourth of July.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. We are borrowing the money from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, $2,700,000, and my city will pay that money back.

Mr. SCHAFER. But I say that after the Fourth of July you will have plenty of money, for they will have beer then in St. Louis by the Fourth of July, just like we didn't have beer by Christmas.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Of course we will have beer by the Fourth of July, and I think the gentleman will be able to get his glass of beer by the 1st of April, for one of the first bills to be passed when the new Congress convenes within the next week or 10 days will be the bill to permit the sale of beer and light wines. I know how hard the gentleman has fought for such a bill and I am sure that action will please him and his city, Milwaukee.

Mr. MILLIGAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. Mead].

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, I take issue with the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Cochran]. There are several meritorious projects included in this omnibus bill; one of them I want to discuss with you at this time.

The State of New York created the Niagara Frontier Bridge Commission about two years ago and that commission made application to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for a loan to construct two bridges at Grand Island, N. Y. These bridges will be under the jurisdiction of the Niagara Frontier Bridge Commission, and they will connect Buffalo with Niagara Falls, shortening the distance between these two cities by several miles. We already have received the approval of Congress for the construction of these two bridges, but the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in passing on the loan or the application for the loan required that both bridges, like the loan itself, be considered as one project. This will permit the tolls of both bridges to be used to pay the interest and to amortize the loan. There is involved in this proposed development along the Niagara frontier an expenditure of some $10,000,000, to be used in building the approaches to the bridges, constructing boulevards, subways, bridges, two State parks, and other necessary work. If the application is approved by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation it will be a splendid unemployment relief program for that area. Therefore I say this measure contains some meritorious projects. Notwithstanding the very able address of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Cochran] and his consistent attitude in connection with private bridge bills, I hope that this measure will be passed without opposition.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. Yes; I yield.

Mr. RICH. What information has the gentleman to give us relative to the amount of traffic that is liable to go over these bridges if the Reconstruction Finance Corporation loans this money? What assurance has the Government to know that tolls will pay back the money loaned?

Mr. MEAD. By the passage of this bill we merely agree to certain demands made on the Niagara Frontier Bridge Commission by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. Their engineering and legal departments will pass upon the merits of the plan. I shall leave that to them. It is not necessary for us to destroy the possibility of the project by refusing to accede to their suggestions, and we can well leave to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation the right to pass on these technical questions in which the gentleman is interested.

Mr. MILLIGAN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous ques-

The previous question was ordered:

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. Lozier). The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

A similar House bill was laid on the table.

INLAND WATERWAY, NORFOLK, VA., TO BEAUFORT INLET, N. C.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 6184) for the improvement of the inland waterway from Norfolk, Va., to Beaufort Inlet, N. C., with Senate amendments, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Page 1, line 11, after the word "conditions," insert "and limitations."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN]?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was agreed to.

SECOND DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 14769) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and prior fiscal year, to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1933, and June 30, 1934, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments, disagree to the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference requested by the Senate; also that the managers on the part of the House at such conference be authorized to act upon any amendment, notwithstanding the provisions of clause 2 of Rule XX.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. WARREN. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Buchanan] if he will give the House an opportunity to vote upon certain amendments placed in the bill by the Senate?

Mr. BUCHANAN. If this unanimous consent is granted, the conferees will bring back to the House a complete report.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman tell what the main points at issue are?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes; I will, as soon as I answer the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Warren]. If this unanimous consent is granted, the conferees will bring back to the House a completed report, which the House will have to vote up or down. The reason that request is made is that these conferees must be appointed, the conference committees of the House and Senate must agree, and the conference go through the House to-night if the bill is to become law. Now, in answer to the question by the gentleman from New York, there are many items in controversy.

Mr. SNELL. I mean the principal ones.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The principal ones are $250,000 for the George Rogers Clark Memorial; $50,000 for the Roanoke Island celebration of some sesquicentennial; $48,000 for the Institute of Agriculture at Rome. With reference to all of these items which I have mentioned, there is no law to sustain or authorize the appropriation, and of course the conference committee will not bring them back to the House to vote on if they are granted the unanimous consent which has been asked.

Mr. SNELL. What is the attitude of the gentleman on these increased appropriations?

Mr. BUCHANAN. The attitude of the gentleman on these increased appropriations is that he is "agin 'em." [Laughter.]

Mr. SNELL. If the gentleman stays that way, I think I am willing to trust him.

Mr. WARREN. Well, reserving the right to object, do I understand, then, that the gentleman from Texas is not going to permit the House to pass upon the amendments placed in the bill by the Senate?

Mr. BUCHANAN. The gentleman understands the attitude of the gentleman from Texas is that he is unalterably opposed to the Senate engrafting upon a deficiency bill—

Mr. SNELL. We ought to trust him, then.

Mr. BUCHANAN. A lot of appropriations that never have been considered by the House, and not estimated for by the Budget, and requiring him to act in the dark as to their merits.

Mr. WARREN. That was not the question I asked the gentleman from Texas. I asked the gentleman from Texas if he would give the House an opportunity to vote them up or down?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I answered that question in my first statement. To be perfectly frank with the gentleman, if this permission is granted, we will bring back a complete conference report, and I am against those amendments, and the probabilities are they will be excluded from this report, and the House will vote this conference report up or down as it sees proper.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I ought to object to the request made by the gentleman from Texas, but having in mind the urgent necessity of the passage of this bill, and desiring not to obstruct the public business, I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and appoints the following conferees: Messrs. Buchanan, Taylor of Colorado, Ayres, Wood of Indiana, and Wason.

P. F. GORMLEY CO.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report on the resolution (S. J. Res. 197) conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims in the claim of P. F. Gormley Co., and I ask unanimous consent that the statement may be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Allgood]?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate joint resolution. The Clerk read the statement.

CONFERENCE REPORT

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 197) conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims in the claim of P. F. Gormley Co., having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House numbered 1, 3, and 4, and amendment to the title, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 2: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 2, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted in said amendment insert the following: "and also claims for damages for extra costs occasioned by orders of the Navy Department requiring the contractor to pay wages at rates fixed by war-time wage boards; by the commandeering of contractor's labor for use on war-time work considered more urgent; for increased costs due to extended period of performance necessitated by war-time conditions and war orders, with the right on the part of the Government to present any legal and equitable set-offs and defenses"; and the House agree to the same.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 197) conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims in the claim of P. F. Gormley Co., submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon and recommended in the accompanying conference report as to each of such amendments, namely:

Recommendations in the accompanying report as to the following amendment are for the purpose of simplifying the language of the resolution and to assure the Government protection of any equitable defenses it may have: 1, 2, 3, and 4, and amendment to the title.

On No. 2 as amended: Restores part of the language used in the original resolution permitting the Gormley Co. to sue for damages for extra costs occasioned by orders of the Navy Department requiring the contractor to pay wages at rates fixed by war-time wage boards; by the commandeering of contractor's labor for use on war-time work considered more urgent and for increased costs due to extended period of performance necessitated by war-time conditions and war orders.

MILES C. ALLGOOD, CHARLES H. MARTIN, J. H. SINCLAIR, Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman explain just what the conference report accomplishes? We have nothing before us as to what the bill is or what the Senate amendments were. I would like to have some information. It is apparent from the report that there were four amendments.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALLGOOD. I yield.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. As I recall, this is the bill that the President elect, when he was Assistant Secretary of the Navy, granted a hearing to the Gormley Co., and in his report to the House of Representatives the President elect, Governor Roosevelt, recommended that the action be taken as recommended by the Committee on War Claims?

Mr. ALLGOOD. That is the fact.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. And in his report he stated he had given Mr. Gormley a complete hearing before he had arrived at his decision?

Mr. ALLGOOD. Yes. This contract was entered into with Gormley a few days before war was declared. It was on March 10. It was a contract to build some structures for the Navy.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield me five minutes?

Mr. ALLGOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Stafford].

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, through the courtesy of the gentleman from Alabama, I take the floor to explain this conference report, because the gentleman from Alabama knows that on the other evening, Wednesday evening, when we had a call of the Special Calendar of Senate bills this was one of the bills given special consideration by me. Several amendments that were proposed by me to the bill were adopted.

The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. Hope] also suggested an amendment, and I wish to direct his attention to the fact that the conferees have virtually reincorporated it in the bill. I call the attention of the gentleman from Kansas in particular to the fact that this is the bill referring to the claim of one P. F. Gormley Co.

Mr. Speaker, when the bill was under consideration the gentleman from Kansas moved to strike out that part relating to extra costs occasioned by orders of the Navy Department and rates of wages paid because of war-time wage-board awards. The amendment the gentleman from Kansas proposed has virtually been reincorporated in the bill. The amendments suggested by me have been agreed upon by the conferees. The substantive amendment I proposed was that no allowance for interest on the determined amount of damage prior to the rendition of this judgment should be allowed.

This is an old claim running back many years and I do not think it proper to allow interest to be attached to the judgment just by reason of the delay of years.

Mr. SNELL. How much does the claim amount to?

Mr. STAFFORD. The claim runs into several thousands of dollars. The report accompanying this bill shows that the present President elect, when Assistant Secretary of the Navy recommended favorable report. This bill allows the matter to be referred to the Court of Claims to ascertain the amount of damages that this P. F. Gormley Co. has suffered by reason of change in the contract price of structural steel, and also by reason of damages they suffered by changes in the rates of wages, and also for increased costs occasioned by extending the period of performance. These latter provisions were stricken out upon the motion of the gentleman from Kansas, who is doing very effective work on the Private Calendar, but they have been reincorporated by the conferees.

Mr. SNELL. Is it satisfactory to the gentleman? Is it in pretty good shape now?

Mr. STAFFORD. I have my doubts as to the merits of the bill notwithstanding the approval of it by the President elect of the United States at a time he served as Assistant Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? Mr. ALLGOOD. I yield.

Mr. SCHAFER. The reason I demanded a division and was going to get a quorum is that the chairman of the Committee on War Claims has not given any reason on the floor of the House for the passage of the bill other than that many years ago the present President elect supported it. The President elect also supported the League of Nations many years ago, but he has changed his position on that, and he may have changed his position on this.

What will be the potential cost to the taxpayers' Treasury if this bill is enacted?

Mr. ALLGOOD. Possibly $20,000. Mr. SCHAFER. Will $25,000 or $30,000 be the maximum, or will we be required to provide millions of dollars, like we have had to on some bills the gentleman's committee has reported in the past?

Mr. ALLGOOD. Since the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] has been Speaker the gentleman's Committee on War Claims has held down all these bills. It has refused to report out bills involving several hundreds of millions of dollars which have been before the committee but which the committee did not report.

Mr. SCHAFER. One further question. Has the gentleman's committee reported this bill out entirely on its merit, or was it reported out only because 13 or 14 years ago the President elect of the United States while Assistant Secretary of the Navy recommended it as indicated by our able colleague, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Cochran]?

Mr. ALLGOOD. We reported it out on its merits.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

The SPEAKER. The Chair wishes to make a statement to the Members of the House. The second deficiency bill and the District of Columbia appropriation bill are in conference, and the best information of the Chair is that the deficiency bill will probably be ready at 9.30 and the District of Columbia appropriation bill by 10 o'clock to-night.

Without objection, the House will stand in recess to meet at the call of the Chair by the ringing of three bells, which will not be later than 9.30 or 10 o'clock to-night.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I inquire of the Speaker whether it would be practicable to have the second deficiency bill enrolled and brought up at 10 o'clock to-morrow as the first order of business, particularly in view of the fact that the Senate has recessed until 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow?

The SPEAKER. It would not be practicable, because we have to conclude action on it to-day. Is there objection? There was no objection.

Accordingly (at 8 o'clock p. m.) the House stood in recess to meet at the call of the Chair.

AFTER RECESS

The recess having expired, at 9.50 o'clock p. m. the House was called to order by the Speaker.

FURTHER MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A further message from the Senate by Mr. Perkins, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House is requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

H. R. 8174. An act to exempt from the quota fathers and mothers over 60 years of age of United States citizens.

SECOND DEFICIENCY BILL

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report on the bill (H. R. 14769) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and prior fiscal years, to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1933, and June 30, 1934, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 14769) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and prior fiscal years, to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1933, and June 30, 1934, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 2, 11, 13, 23, 33, 34, and 36.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 3, 4, 5, 9, 10, 12, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, and 56, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 6: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 6, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum named in said amendment insert "$35,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 7: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 7, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

Sections 4 and 5 of the public resolution approved March 2, 1929 (U. S. C., Supp. VI, title 1, sec. 54 (a) and (b)), are hereby amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 4. The publications provided for in such act of May 29, 1928 (U. S. C., Supp. VI, title, ch. 3), as amended by this resolution, and with such ancillaries, shall be printed and bound in such style, form, and manner as may be directed by the Joint Committee on Printing.

"'SEC. 5. In order to avoid waste in the appropriations for printing and binding for Congress, the Joint Committee on Printing is hereby empowered to authorize the printing of any bill or resolution, with index and ancillaries, before Congress in such style and form as the joint committee may deem to be most suitable in the interest of economy and efficiency and to so continue until final enactment thereof in both Houses of Congress; and such committee may also curtail the number of copies of such bills or resolutions to be printed in the various parliamentary stages in the Congress, including the slip form of each public act or public resolution."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 8: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 8, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum named in said amendment insert "$2,500"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 14: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 14, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum named in said amendment insert "$175,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 35: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 35, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 10 of the matter inserted by said amendment strike out "$6,400," and in line 6 of the matter inserted by said amendment, after the numerals "1933," insert the following: "$6,400"; and the Senate agree to the same.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 14769) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and prior fiscal years, to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1933, and June 30, 1934, and for other purposes, submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon and recommended in the accompanying conference report as to each of such amendments, namely:

On Nos. 1 to 5, inclusive, relating to the Senate: Appropriates for expenses of the Senate in the amounts and in the manner proposed by the Senate, as follows: $40,000 for miscellaneous items; $13,000 for Senate restaurants; and $15,000 for inquiries and investigations. Strikes out the additional compensation of $600 proposed by the Senate for an employee detailed from the Veterans' Administration to the Senate Committee on Pensions.

On No. 6: Appropriates $35,000, instead of $50,000, as proposed by the Senate, for expenses of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce for expenses of investigations under House Joint Resolution numbered 572 of the present session.

On No. 7: Provides, as proposed by the Senate, authority for the Joint Committee on Printing to curtail waste in public printing and binding in connection with the printing of bills and resolutions by amendment of the act of March 2, 1929.

On No. 8: Appropriates $2,500, instead of $4,000, as proposed by the Senate, for the removal of part of the statues from Statuary Hall.

On Nos. 9 and 10, relating to the Senate Office Building: Appropriates $75,000, as proposed by the Senate, for furnishings and equipment for the new wing, and $13,500 for alterations in the old portion of the building.

On No. 11: Strikes out the appropriation of $250,000 inserted by the Senate for the George Rogers Clark Sesquicentennial Commission.

On No. 12: Appropriates $605.12 for the Advisory Committee for Aeronautics, as proposed by the Senate, for the payment of an outstanding bill.

On No. 13: Strikes out the appropriation of $50,000 inserted by the Senate for the United States Roanoke Colony Commission.

On No. 14: Appropriates $175,000, instead of $300,000, as proposed by the Senate, for emergency relief in the District of Columbia payable from the revenues of such District.

On Nos. 15, 16, and 17: Appropriates $415.26 additional for the payment of authorized settlements of claims against the District of Columbia certified after the bill had passed the House.

On Nos. 18 and 19: Appropriates $2,932 additional for the payment of judgments against the District of Columbia certified after the bill had passed the House.

On Nos. 20, 21, and 22, relating to the Indian Service: Appropriates $65,000 for replacement of a building destroyed by fire at the Sacaton Indian school, Arizona, as proposed by the Senate; appropriates $40,000 for repairing a building and replacing equipment destroyed by fire at the Chilocco Indian School, Oklahoma, as proposed by the Senate; and appropriates $19,357 for the payment of claims of individual Sioux Indians as proposed by the Senate and as authorized by the act of February 16, 1933.

On No. 33: Appropriates $25,000, as proposed by the House instead of $40,000, as proposed by the Senate, for silt investigations of the Colorado River.

On No. 24: Appropriates $80,000, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $70,000, as proposed by the House, for the Shenandoah National Park.

On Nos. 25, 26, 27, 28, and 29: Appropriates $1,920.78 additional, as proposed by the Senate, for fees of United States Commissioners, and $26.77 additional for supplies for United States courts.

On Nos. 30, 31, 32, and 33, relating to the Department of State: Appropriates $55, as proposed by the Senate, for payment of a treaty obligation relating to liquor traffic in Africa; $30,000 for the payment to Mexico in accordance with the provisions of the act of February 25, 1933, for the killing of two Mexican citizens by deputy sheriffs of Oklahoma; $150,000 for expenses of participation by the United States in an international monetary and economic conference to be held in London; and strikes out the appropriation of $48,500, inserted by the Senate, for expenses of participation by the United States in the International Institute of Agriculture at Rome.

On No. 34: Strike out the paragraph inserted by the Senate to prohibit the Commissioner of Internal Revenue from paying tax refunds in excess of $20,000 until such refunds have been approved by the Board of Tax Appeals.

On No. 35: Appropriates $6,400, as proposed by the Senate, to pay a condemnation award for land at Camp Bullis, Tex.

On No. 36: Strikes out the increase proposed by the Senate in the amount for traveling expenses for the Ordnance Department of the Army.

On No. 37: Appropriates $30,000, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $20,000, as proposed by the House, for extension of the national cemetery at San Francisco.

On Nos. 38 to 43, inclusive, relating to damage claims: Appropriates $1.952.84 additional for the payment of claims settled by the departments and certified to Congress after the bill had passed the House.

On Nos. 44 to 54, inclusive: Appropriates for the payment of judgments rendered against the United States by United States district courts and the Court of Claims and certified to Congress for payment after the bill had passed the House.

On Nos. 55 and 56: Appropriates for the payment of audited claims allowed by the Comptroller General and certified to Congress for payment after the bill had passed the House.

J. P. BUCHANAN,
EDWARD T. TAYLOR,
W. A. AYRES,
WILL R. WOOD,
EDWARD H. WASON,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the statement may be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I think the House would be interested, even at this late hour, as to the agreement of the conferees on amendment No. 34, pertaining to the Board of Tax Appeals. Will the gentleman tell us just what was the agreement so far as that amendment is concerned?

Mr. BUCHANAN. The Senate amendment was clearly legislation and the Senate receded on its amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then, as I understand the action of the conferees, there has been no change as to the payment of these tax refunds?

Mr. BUCHANAN. The bill carries $28,000,000 for the payment of taxes erroneously collected.

Mr. STAFFORD. And they will be handled just as they are under existing law?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Correct.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes. Mr. McFADDEN. I notice there is included in this bill the McReynolds bill, providing an appropriation of $150,000 for the London Economic Conference.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The $150,000 carried in this bill is for an economic and monetary international conference.

Mr. McFADDEN. This is a matter that has never been discussed in the House. It is a matter of great importance and is a further involvement of the United States in foreign affairs. I think it is a matter that ought to be discussed here. It is an outgrowth of the conference held in London in 1931, which is a part of the whole program to further involve the United States in international affairs, where war debts, tariffs, and everything else will be discussed. The very existence of the United States, I think, is involved in it, and I am decidedly opposed to it. Cancellation of war debts is also involved.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield me five minutes on this item?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to my colleague, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Blanton].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, we have spent $450,000 recently in a European conference. It was a ridiculous waste of public money. We had a lot of high-salaried employees over there for months, spending the people's hardearned tax money like water, and having a good time on a fine junket trip. That was about all it was, a wasteful, uneventful, unnecessary, outrageous junket. We took chances every day they were over there that some of them would say some foolish thing, or do some foolish act, that might involve us in foreign entanglements, something that we must avoid in the future.

When good people here in our own United States-millions of them, Mr. Speaker-were without jobs, were walking the streets disconsolate with their wives and little children at home hungry and not properly clad, we did this foolish thing, but not with my vote. At this very time there were millions of people all over Europe likewise without jobs, with families suffering, and when they saw our American representatives and employees at this so-called conference, putting up at the finest hotels, eating the finest foods, attending the finest entertainments, coming there on luxurious palaces of the sea, and spending American tax money like water-about a half a million dollars of it-it had a tendency to make Europeans hate Americans.

I made a fight here on this floor at that time to save this $450,000, but I was outvoted, and it was spent and wasted.

Now, here is another proposal put in by the Senate as a rider on an appropriation bill to spend another $150,000 on another European conference.

We have already spent on this particular conference the sum of $40,000 in a preliminary conference, and with this new proposal to spend another $150,000 makes a total of $190,000 that will be spent to send our young boys again to Europe. If there ever was an hour when we ought to stay out of Europe it is right now. [Applause.]

Another body always waits until the closing hours of Congress to put these riders on appropriation bills, and send them back here where you have got to vote the conference report up or down. If you vote it down, you kill the bill, and I am not willing to kill this bill. Therefore, although I am fundamentally against this provision and believe it ought not to pass, because it may ultimately involve the cancellation of war debts, and I do not want to see a dollar that Europe owes the United States ever canceled, I am forced to let this item pass in order not to kill this big supply bill at this late hour.

I am going along with my colleague [Mr. Buchanan], chairman of this committee, who has done the best he could. I have for him the highest respect and commendation. He sits around the table with autocratic-well, I will not say that, but if there was not this courtesy between this House and another body somewhere else, I would say something stronger than that. My colleague has done the best he could with the bill; he has brought things back here that ordinarily he would not agree to, but he was forced to do so in order to get this supply bill passed in this session.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Does not the gentleman think we will have better treatment at the other end of the Capitol when our great Speaker goes over there?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly, all of us know that. I think it will be mighty fine for the country when he goes over there, and when our new chief, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY], is in the chair, and when our splendid new majority leader, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Byrns], takes charge of things here at the head table.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. And Mr. Snell, of New York, over here.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes, because all of us old-timers love to see BERT SNELL over there in charge of things on the minority side, but of things only on the side of the minority. This $150,000 will be wasted, as we can not stop it, but we would stop it if we could.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

WALTER SAM YOUNG

Mr. LAMNECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 2907) for the relief of Walter Sam Young and agree to the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill and the following Senate amendment:

Page 1, line 9, strike out all after "Provided" down to and including "act," in line 11, and insert "That no compensation, retirement pay, back pay, pension, or other benefit shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act."

The Senate amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for such part of 10 minutes as we are waiting for the next conference report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, the session that is just coming to a close will be memorable because of the legislation that was passed in the closing hours in the attempt to relieve in some way the financial conditions of the country that have been threatening its stability for the last two years. The most notable is the amendment of the bankruptcy act that ameliorates the conditions threatening the debtor class large and small, and that provides procedural relief for threatened receivership proceedings of insolvent railroads.

A great President is about to retire from office. I think history will write down the fact that Herbert Hoover performed a rather legislative miracle in passing remedial legislation sponsored by him when it is considered that he had confronting him adverse majorities in both Houses of Congress. It was not an easy task in the economic debacle that deluged the country for any President, even if he had a sympathetic Congress to support him. Politics prior to the election played a foremost part. It was said by a noted English statesman, Sir Joseph Chamberlain, that the purpose of the opposition is to oppose. And then what? To oppose. And then what? To oppose. The Democratic Party, as I look back in retrospect, allowed the President grudgingly some of the program which he espoused. It was politics. He had advocated much legislation for relief of the financial, banking, and industrial conditions of the country which were not considered except under compulsion. That was prior to the election.

Since the election, when politics has been largely adjourned, both parties, at least in this House, have recognized the seriousness of the situation and have cooperated in every way toward putting on the statute books legislation that was urgently needed.

It was my high privilege to serve in this body during the crucial days of the World War. I was then a member of the Committee on Appropriations. That committee, as some of the old Members know, voted out $26,000,000,000 of appropriations. As I look back upon those trying times and compare them with those of to-day, I really believe that the conditions confronting the country to-day are much more serious and critical than those which confronted the country during the World War. Then there was no trouble to raise money, no trouble to bond the Government. Everyone was in accord with one idea, to win the war.

In this industrial depression, however-and my memory goes back more than 30 years—we are confronted with the same conditions that have always confronted the country when we have had industrial depression. I remember long before I saw service in this body—and my first service, as you know, ranges back 30 years-I noted that there always evolved out of times of industrial depressions all kinds of panaceas for relief.

As I look into the future, I somewhat dread it, so far as this House is concerned, because I fear the next Congress is going to be beset with all kinds of radical proposals, gropings in the dark, trying to remedy existing industrial conditions. I agree, however, as do most students of finance, and as all those prominent business men, financiers, and bankers, who have been testifying before the Senate Finance Committee the last few days, with the distinguished and brilliant gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Hub-DLESTON | that in times of industrial depression it is no time to experiment. We should adhere fast to principle. When things are going along smoothly, when a large industrial concern has large reserves, it may well afford and can afford to experiment with those reserves in new ventures. So it is with government. A government can afford this or that experiment in prosperous times, but when dark and dire days confront the Nation, then I believe it is statesmanship to adhere fast and firm to the principles that are sound and have been proven sound in the evolvement and development of government.

Mr. Speaker, I had no thought of making a swan song, and I do not wish to. I was asked by the Speaker to take some time to fill in until a conference report was ready for presentation to the House. Thirty years is a long period for a person to scan back and compare conditions to-day with conditions then.

When I first entered the House as a young man in the twenties, never having had prior legislative experience, I naturally was interested in studying the theory of government and the practice of government as it was displayed on the floor of this House. It was my good fortune in the first term I served to have come under the observation of a great parliamentary leader, Mr. James R. Mann, and no leader, in my opinion, in the history of the Government was greater than he. [Applause.] As I look upon the old days, the Committee on Appropriations scanned and fought every increase of appropriation. We were most jealous of economy. We were fearful of the inroads of a precedent. The Government has changed mightily in these 30 years. There has been a disposition, especially in the last decade, for us to launch into various new avenues of governmental venture. Members of the committee are overwhelmed with work. The work of the Committee on Appropriations has manifolded ten times. In the early days in its appropriating powers were limited to five bills-the fortification bill; the sundry civil appropriation bill; the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill; the deficiency bill; and perhaps one or two others of minor importance.

Then came the war, and the legislative leaders realized that it was necessary to merge all of the appropriating powers into one committee, so that the Budget then established as a part of our legislative system could be followed. The appropriating powers were accordingly transferred from six committees and vested in the Appropriations Committee. The Committee on Agriculture, the Committee on Indian Affairs, the Committee on Military Affairs, the Committee on Naval Affairs, the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads all had appropriating powers. They were regarded as major committees of the House. When those appropriating powers were taken away from those legislative committees there was a contest on the floor of the House against the deprivation of their legislative power so far as appropriations were concerned.

I then thought there could be a compromise whereby the legislative committees could cooperate with the Appropriations Committee. Some days ago I gave expression to a thought that I had long held close in my mind, that it would be better for legislation in the House if Representatives on the legislative committees would sit in, in the formation and framing of the respective appropriation bills covering the jurisdiction of the legislative committees. It would have a double purpose. It would give the appropriations subcommittees the viewpoint of the legislative committee and in turn the latter would have the value of the recommendations presented by the heads of departments and bureaus as to needed legislation. Appropriating powers and legislative powers are closely intertwined. I served a few years back on the Appropriations Committee as a member of the War Department subcommittee; the past four years as a member of the Committee on Military Affairs. I wish to say that my acquaintance with military affairs was largely gleaned from my service of four years on the War Department Subcommittee on Appropriations. This suggestion I leave to the next Congress as a contribution toward procedural reform that will redound to the benefit of legislation. The legislative committees should be strengthened in their functioning. This reform will aid materially toward that end.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL-FISCAL YEAR 1934

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report on the bill (H. R. 14643) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, and for other purposes, and I ask unanimous consent that the statement may be read in lieu of the report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Cannon]?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

CONFERENCE REPORT

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. > CLARENCE CANNON, WILLIAM J. GRANFIELD, ROBT. G. SIMMONS, Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, we present a conference report on which I believe we can all agree. Of course, no one is ever completely satisfied with the District bill. It always appropriates too much money for those who are economically minded on the hill, and it never appropriates enough money for our friends downtown. But we have here a bill which makes concessions to both. It is in that respect the most satisfactory bill that has been presented for years.

The District bill as it passed the House was, in round numbers, $3,000,000 under the Budget estimates and $6,000,-000 under last year's bill. The Senate added approximately $3,000,000 to the bill as it passed the House, but in conference we reduced their increases more than half.

Incidentally, while it does not show in the totals, for the reason that it is an item paid by the District to the Treasury, by insisting on one item alone we saved the Federal Government $1,000,000.

And last, we carry in this bill the lowest Federal contribution to District funds of any bill passed within the last 20 or 30 years. It is in that respect the most satisfactory District bill reported within the memory of any member of the committee.

The bill in its present form has the approval of the leaders of the House, and I hope we can agree to the conference report and forward it to-night to the Senate for final consideration to-morrow.

Mr. Speaker, I now yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Blanton], a member of the committee.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, this is one conference report that, in the dying hours of Congress, ought to be voted down. We passed this big supply bill two weeks ago and sent it to the Senate. They had plenty of time to carefully consider it, pass it, and send it back to us several days ago. They have placed on this bill 174 amendments, ranging from $1,000 and $25,000, on up to one as high as $3,500,000; and they sent it back to us to-day loaded down with these 174 costly amendments.

They talk about a free and fair conference. If this was one, then, good Lord, deliver us. We conferees went over there, five of us, and how many do you suppose the Senate sent down there? Seven big United States Senators. When the House, with 435 Members, sends 5 Members to the conference the Senate, with 96 Senators, sends 7 Members; and I got tired of receding and concurring. We would recede on $25,000 for them and $50,000 and $100,000 items, and do you know why we did it? We five House conferees could not outtalk those seven United States Senators.

As no House conferee gave out to the press any information about this conference, we suppose that it came from the other end of the Capitol. Here is what the reliable Washington Star says about what occurred:

All hope of passing the District appropriation bill at this session appeared to be gone when Senate and House conferees reached a deadlock late this afternoon over the amount of the Federal contribution, and broke up without any plans for a further meet-

Contribution, and broke up without any plans for a further inceting.

The House, in passing the bill several weeks ago, cut the Federal share toward the upkeep of the National Capital down to $6,500,000. The Senate placed it at $9,500,000.

When the bill went to conference at 2 p. m., having passed the Senate this morning, the Senate conferees, headed by Senator Bingham, Republican, of Connecticut, offered to compromise, first on $8,000,000. When that falled, the Senators offered a continuation of the present amount, $7,775,000, which was agreed to last tion of the present amount, $7,775,000, which was agreed to last

HOUSE MEMBERS REFUSE

The Senate conferees were unanimous in their willingness to make this concession, but the House members, it is reported, rejected the proposal by a 3 to 2 vote. It is understood that Reprejected the proposal by a 3 to 2 vote. It is understood that Resentatives SIMMONS, of Nebraska, and Holaday, of Illinois, the House Members willing to make the compromise.

Chairman Bingham, of the Senate group, indicated that there would be no further conference, unless the House Members suggested a further discussion.

When the conference began, considerable headway was made during the first hour in striking a middle ground on the approximately 150 amendments relating to the amounts to be allotted for various municipal activities. Approximately 80 of these amendments had been disposed of, with the Senate yielding on some and the House on others, when a test of sentiment was taken on the major issue of what would be a fair share for the Federal Government to pay.

Now here is what the Star said about the respective conferees:

In order to have as much time as possible to work on the measure in conference, Senator Bingham, Republican, Connecticut, obtained the appointment of Senate conferees by Vice President Curtis the moment the bill had passed. They were:

Senators Bingham, Connecticut; Capper, Kansas; Nye, North Dakota; Streiwer, Oregon; Glass, Virginia; Kendrick, Wyoming, and COPELAND, New York.

The entire House subcommittee on the District bill were ap-rice entire House subcommittee on the District bill were appointed as House conferees. They are:

Representatives Cannon, Missouri; Granfield, Massachusetts, and Blanton, Texas, all Democrats; Holaday, Illinois, and Simmons, Nebraska, both Republicans.

Was not that a formidable array of senatorial talent to put across the table in front of overawed House conferees? And the Star tells us just how the first conference ended:

After more than half of the amendments in the bill had been settled, Representative BLANTON, of Texas, found that he would have to leave the conference for a while on other business, and requested that the question of the Federal contribution be not taken up until his return. The Senate conferees suggested that the other amendments be laid aside temporarily and an effort be made to settle the Federal contribution first. Efforts were started along this line, but it soon developed that the majority of the House group would not accept the Senate's offer of compromise.

My distinguished friend and colleague from Missouri [Mr. Cannonl deserves the highest praise for his hard work put in on this bill. He sat at the table across from shrewd bureau chiefs week after week holding tiresome hearings and thoroughly posting himself and his committee with all pertinent facts in an effort to cut wasteful expenses. He reduced the bill, but he has a good and sufficient reason for I every single reduction. But when as conferees we were told by somebody sitting at the head of the table that if we did not grant more than the House had agreed to grant there would not be any bill; it would die; it was not our fault. When our chairman said he could not help it, as we could not agree to give away $9,500,000 of the people's tax money, we were told that ended the conference; they said it was going to die; they would not consider it any further; and we came back to the House. Then after about two hours, we saw a long, lean, lanky gentleman come over into a certain office in this end of the Capitol and have a star-chamber conference with somebody that was not on the official conference, and then an agreement was reached; and that star-chamber agreement resulted in this conference report. Do you call that a fair and free conference? Then two, and only two, House conferees carried out the wish of somebody.

There was a time when the United States Government paid 50-50; that is, paid one-half of every bit of the civic expenses of this great city of Washington. When our already overburdened taxpayers back home had to pay their State taxes, their county taxes, their city taxes, their school taxes, their sewer taxes, their water taxes, every kind of a tax, then they had to come here and pay half of the city taxes of the people of Washington. It was an outrage. That rocked along for quite a number of years, while the tax rate here was only 80 cents on the hundred. Then we raised the tax rate to 90 cents and to $1.10 and $1.20 and finally to $1.70 on the $100, and then we paid 60-40 for a while on all expenses here. For a time the Senate forced us to have our home taxpayers pay $11,000,000; then $9,500,000 on the civic expenses here.

Mr. Mapes, of Michigan, is one of the finest men in this Congress. [Applause.] A man who as our commissioned servant of this House has spent months of careful study and investigation of this question; the only man who has ever given any scientific investigation to this matter. His committee brought five bills in here, and this House passed all five of them unanimously and sent them to the Senate a year and a half ago, and not one of them has ever been passed into law yet. They have died in pigeon holes. Mr. Mapes said that this Government ought not ever spend more than $6,500,000 contribution to the District, yet we are told, in order to get a bill in the dying hours of Congress that we have to increase it. We ought to kill this conference report.

Did you know that these people here in Washington pay a tax of only $1.70 on the hundred dollars now? One dollar and seventy cents on the hundred! That is the total tax they pay. All of their paving is done with that. You can buy a house here now, and you will not have to pay a dollar for sewer service; not a dollar for the next 50 years. That is all paid by the city. You have to pay for sewer service monthly in the States. You can get water here for about $7 per year per family, the finest water in the world. You do not get that cheap rate in Wisconsin. I do not think they use water much in Milwaukee, but what you do use you do not get there for any $7 per family. And this Government built and owned the original water conduit in the District, and it has spent several million dollars altogether in water facilities.

This Government at the expense of the American people maintains here a big colored university, Howard University, upon which it has spent millions. This Government maintains here a number of fine hospitals, for which Washington people pay nothing. This Government has about 70,000 Federal employees here which it pays regularly every two weeks with new money that when first spent, is spent in Washington, and this big Federal pay roll keeps up the merchants, the theaters, the newspapers, the doctors, the lawyers, the dentists, and all of the business interests of Washington. And to let you know just how the reclassification act of 1923 has caused salaries of District of Columbia employees to be raised, I want you to note the following raises that have been granted to them:

1 Created since 1923.

Per diem.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, the above will show the kind of salaries that are paid to these Washington employees of the District of Columbia.

Every tree, Mr. Speaker, that has been planted here in the residential sections along the sidewalks, thousands upon thousands of them have been paid for by the District and Federal Governments. The people do not have to pay for any of the trees in front of their property. They are planted along those sidewalks; they are furnished free; they are taken care of and sprayed every season. Ashes are gathered free. Garbage is gathered free. The trash is gathered free, all costing Washington people nothing, while our own people in all of the States have to pay for these various services.

And then, on automobiles, you pay $1 here to get your automobile registered—a Pierce-Arrow, or a Cadillac, or a Rolls-Royce limousine—you pay $1 to get it registered here and for your license tags. Everywhere else you pay from $20 to $25 and up to $40 and $50.

Everywhere else you have a State income tax. Washington people do not pay any here to their local government; not a dollar.

Everywhere else you have a high gasoline tax. Down in t Tennessee it is 7 cents a gallon, but in Washington it is 2 cents outside of the 1 cent Federal tax-2 cents a gallon. We tried to raise it 1 cent more by the Mapes bill and the Senate will not let us do it. There are entirely too many fine palatial residences out in the northwest, and on Sixteenth, and on Connecticut and Massachusetts Avenues, and in these other fine residential sections whose owners want everything cheap as possible.

Are you going to be charitable with all Washington extravagance? Why, when there was built that palatial $800,000 underground garage which has been advertised in all the State newspapers so much lately every Congressman was charged with being responsible for it. I have never had my car in it. We are not responsible for it. I have been here 16 years. I have paid $10 a month for garage space in Washington for my car ever since I have been here.

The newspapers are full of articles about free baths for certain favorites. We Members here do not get any in the House. We pay for all baths and everything we get. The newspapers are full of articles about free shaves and free hair cuts, and free shampoos, and free manicures for certain epicures in Washington. We do not get any over here. We pay for everything we get, and I pay full price, and as much as it costs downtown. Why, the newspapers are full of free mineral water and ginger ale. We Members of the House do not get any of it here. We pay for all we get, and pay full price.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. How about White Rock?

Mr. BLANTON. We pay for every bottle of White Rock we get here. We pay for everything else we get here, and we pay full price.

I want to say to you colleagues it is about time we considered the folks back home, many of them out of work, some of them with all the money they have earned in life tied up in closed banks. They can not pay their own taxes, yet a body somewhere else in Washington, in the closing hours of Congress, holds us up here like a highwayman, like a fellow who says, "Stick 'em up!" and we are forced to stand and deliver if we keep this bill from dying.

I want to kill this bill as dead as h- to-night. [Applause.]

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order and ask that the gentleman's words be taken down.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, no; you do not.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to another point of order. Instead of saying that, the gentleman should take his seat, according to the decisions.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, that is monkey business.

Mr. GOSS. The gentleman is talking monkey business. Mr. BLANTON. I leave it to my colleagues as to whether I have used language that General MARTIN does not use, or that BERT SNELL does not use. I have heard BERT SNELL use other than Sunday school language at various times.

If, however, I have offended the seemingly unusually sensitive sensibilities of General Goss, I withdraw that word "hell." The general disapproves it. Well, when I get him out in the cloakroom I will say something that will really spoil his sensibilities, because there will be blue indigo attached to it.

The fellow who can keep from cussing just a little when he sees things going on here in Congress that ought not to go on, has no business representing the people of the United States. [Applause.]

The people do not like what is going on here. That is why some of you boys are going home for good to-morrow.

I wish you would get this bill and read these 174 amendments we found tacked on it when it came back here to-day. I wish you would see just how many of the important onesamendment after amendment—they made us come across on, how many important costly ones; and when it was finally agreed upon, after that star-chamber caucus, you ought to know how many House conferees were there. Why, our friend from Nebraska, Bob Simmons, was not there in this star-chamber proceeding or in this final conference. do it?

Bob was not there. He did not know anything about it, though he afterwards signed it. My friend Holaday was not there and knew nothing about it, and I got disgusted and left. I could not afford to waste my valuable time there. When I saw that all we could say was just to repeat parrotlike, "We recede and concur," I got disgusted and left.

The only two left there were Brother GRANFIELD and Clarence. I love Clarence. The gentleman from Missouri, CLARENCE CANNON, our distinguished chairman, is pure gold. He could not help it. I know down in Clarence's heart he wants to see this bill killed as dead as h-[Laughter.] He is one of the most valuable men in this House. I know down in his heart the Speaker of this House must want to see it killed, because he does not like to be held up. I believe that the distinguished and able minority leader, BERT SNELL-I have watched him, I have great admiration for his fighting qualities: I do not believe he likes it; he is not the kind of a man who will let a dictator come over here to our end of the Capitol.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, now I do rise to the point of order and ask that the gentleman's words be taken down, because the gentleman is speaking disrespectfully of one of my colleagues.

Mr. BLANTON. How does the gentleman know?

Mr. GOSS. Because the gentleman referred to him a while ago as the gentleman sitting at the head of the table.

Mr. BLANTON. Is that the gentleman's Senator? Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, I insist on my point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. I withdraw the remark, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman can not withdraw it. I insist on the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. I will submit that to my colleague that some one I had in mind is long, lean, and lanky.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. Jones). The gentleman from Texas will take his seat in accordance with the requirements of the rule.

Mr. BLANTON. After to-morrow noon, he will not be a Senator any longer. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, if it is in order, I ask that the gentleman from Texas be allowed to proceed

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas may be permitted to proceed in order. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, some people say I know the rules of the House. I do not believe that I know all of them perfectly, but so far as I do, I shall obey them.

When a man watches the way the long, lean, lanky arm of the District of Columbia reaches, year after year, into the Treasury of the United States and pulls out millions of the people's money, he can hardly speak in order. I wish that the constituents of every man here in Congress could know just how much Congress has given the District of Columbia in cold cash. I know some city lots here that when I first came here were not worth $100, but because of the hundreds of millions of dollars Congress has spent here in the District, they are worth to-day $500,000 apiece. Here is what the early edition of the Herald says the inaugural is doing for Washington:

250,000 VISITORS PACK HOTELS

Upwards of 250,000 visitors from all over the country are in Washington to see the inauguration of the man they hope is the new political Messiah who is to pilot the people out of the dark-

In the case of every single piece of property that the Government has taken over here in the last 20 years the Government has been robbed. The Government has been charged about ten times what the property ought to have been sold for. The Government is easy picking for the people of the District of Columbia.

When is it going to stop? When are you going to stop it?

Mr. SCHAFER. Now. Mr. BLANTON. The people are expecting you to stop it, and they want you to stop it now, John. Are you willing to If you Republicans follow your leader here, and your straw boss, John Schafer, we will kill this conference report to-night. We will vote it down. That will kill the bill. We are going to meet next week in a new Seventy-third Congress, and we can pass this bill, when there will not be any obstruction over yonder. [Laughter and applause.] He will be back in General Goss's country, and there will not be any more holdups. We will not be bothered any more with star-chamber conferences or lobbying on this floor with Members.

Mr. KVALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. KVALE. If the bill is killed, will my friend from Texas tell us what will happen to the $625,000 that is so sorely needed for direct relief in the District of Columbia?

Mr. BLANTON. Why, that is not available until July 1; and we gave them $625,000 for relief the very day this Congress met, in the first deficiency bill, and they have not spent it all yet. We can pass this bill the first week we meet in the new Congress.

Mr. KVALE. It will be spent very shortly, I understand. Mr. BLANTON. We will have it available by July 1. And there is $175,000 for them in this bill. That will last some time.

I want to say to my friend from Minnesota that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Holaday] will bear me out in the statement that when we got a breakdown on the employees of this welfare association handling relief funds in Washington two of them were drawing $9,000 a year to administer welfare funds, and there are several of them drawing $5,000 a year to administer welfare funds to starving children and widows. Do you want to keep this up? No.

We will be in session next Wednesday or Monday week in a new Congress, and we can take care of this bill then. Let us kill this conference report. We can kill this bill by voting down the conference report to-night. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SIMMONS].

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Speaker, like my good friend from Wisconsin, I am making what is probably my last statement in this Congress on a matter that has been the subject of controversy during my 10 years of service here, and a matter of controversy during the eight years that I have been a member of the subcommittee handling this particular bill and a member of the Committee on Appropriations.

I want to say frankly to the membership of the House that there are things in this conference report that I do not like, but I want to say as frankly to the membership of the House that I signed the conference report to-night, hoping that it means the passage of the bill; and I believe it is for the best interest of the District of Columbia that the bill be passed in this Congress.

I have gone through the fight over various items—the gentleman from Texas and I have been in accord in the great majority of these fights. There are things about the relationship between the District and the Federal Government that I do not approve of, but when you go into conference with Members of another body who have the same legislative rights that we have, who have the same right of consideration of their views, anyone who sits around the conference table knows that there must be a compromise on issues. Were it not so, there would be no successful conference between the two bodies in Congress.

What do you have here? You have a dispute, as I understand it, on one thing, and that is the question of the Federal contribution to the support of the District of Columbia.

It is the smallest amount that has been given the District during the 10 years that I have been in this body.

This House has repeatedly voted to give from the Federal Treasury to the District of Columbia more money than this conference report provides, and this Congress in its last session voted to contribute $115,000 more as a Federal contribution than this report carries.

Mr. KVALE. Does not the gentleman think that some of the salaries paid relief workers are excessive?

Mr. SIMMONS. I will touch that in a moment. After all of the controversies we have had with the Senate, after all of the times that this bill has hung at different Congresses for months in suspended animation, this group of conferees bring back to the House the smallest amount of Federal contribution that has been reported in years, and this group comes closer to bringing back to the House the recommendations of the Mapes committee than we have had in 10 years. So I see no reason for defeating the conference report upon the basis of the fiscal contribution on the part of the United States. I signed this report tonight in this Chamber since 10 o'clock, largely because I believed that this conference report on that issue at least brings to the Congress and to the House of Representatives as fair a Federal contribution as it will be possible for the next Congress to bring forth.

A number of reasons exist why this conference report should be adopted if possible and this bill become a law at this session. There are some funds in this bill that are immediately available for employment of labor. That money ought to be immediately available to give work to men who need it in the District of Columbia. In this bill the total items available for immediate expenditure in the District for street items amount to $2,778,000, and they are largely items that give employment to men who want to work, and if this Congress can give work to any one man we ought to stay up all night to give him that job to-morrow morning. Two million seven hundred and seventy-eight thousand dollars for that kind of labor. Then there is the item of $876,000 for school matters, which again is construction. which means work for men who want work in the District of Columbia.

If this bill does not pass at this session of Congress, in my judgment it will run well toward the 1st of July before it becomes a law. I know the mechanics of the District government. In one session of the last Congress we ran beyond the end of the fiscal year and upset their entire arrangement. So there is very good reason why we should adopt this conference report now. There is another reason for it, and that is the matter that is raised by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KVALE]. This bill carries in the language of the original Budget as submitted to Congress $625,000 unemployment relief money. That the District of Columbia ought to have. It is their own fund. We threshed that out here, and the House agreed to that. The language has been changed somewhat. They need that money in the District of Columbia. I do not believe any good purpose can be served by delaying this bill. The harm done to the District will far outweigh any benefit that can come from it, and the criticism that will come to the Federal Government if we fail to do everything that is possible here in the Capital City which we govern will be far more than it will cost the Government to pass the bill now.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Speaker, I want to remind the gentleman of his promise to touch on the salaries paid relief workers.

Mr. SIMMONS. Oh, yes. There are some salaries paid relief workers in the District of Columbia that, in all probability, are excessive. That is an administrative matter, but we should not deny relief to the unemployed people of this District because we disagree and disapprove of some of the salary items. Does that answer the gentleman's question?

Mr. KVALE. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman wants to appropriate $7,775,000 of the people's money out of the General Treasury, some of which is to give jobs here in the city of Washington, when people out home in Nebraska and every other State in this land are walking the streets without jobs. Is not the gentleman in favor of them rather than of the favored people in the city of Washington?

Mr. SIMMONS. The gentleman has asked a question, and I will answer it. The gentleman from Texas knows about this bill and makes a statement of fact that is not correct.

The gentleman from Texas used figures on the floor of the House that are not in the conference report. We are not asking for $7,775,000.

Mr. BLANTON. But that is what you appropriate in this hill

Mr. SIMMONS. It is $7,600,000. It is the smallest amount that the House of Representatives has ever been able to get out of a conference with the Senate, and I congratulate the chairman of this committee on it. The amount actually in dispute is not $7,600,000 but $1,100,000, for that is the difference between the House figures of $6,500,000 and the conference report. The gentleman knows

Mr. BLANTON. You are appropriating $7,600,000 out of the people's Treasury to spend here in Washington.

Mr. SIMMONS. Well, I have just saved $115,000 out of the gentleman's own figures. I think I have done pretty well at that for one minute's work. [Applause.]

Now, let me say, further, the Senate of the United States is entitled to some recognition, even in the House of Representatives. [Applause.] Their views are entitled to some recognition. The chairman of this subcommittee has brought back to this House the smallest Federal appropriation in all of the 10 years I have been a Member of this House.

Mr. BLANTON. Is the gentleman in favor of them coming over here and sitting in our pews and lobbying?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Speaker, I do not yield further to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. What appropriations are carried in this bill that are made immediately available?

Mr. SIMMONS. I just read that figure-$2,778,850 of street items, largely common labor, and $876,000 of school items, or a total of $3,654,350 of appropriations in this bill that will be immediately available, which can be immediately spent, largely for common labor, if the Congress will adopt this conference report before we adjourn to-morrow noon.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. What sums are now available for those purposes under the present bill?

Mr. SIMMONS. That question I can not answer except generally. The money appropriated for street items is spent during the summer, on account of the fact that construction work can not be carried on in the winter. There is some, of course, available, because they carry over a part of their program into the spring.

Mr. BOILEAU. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield. Mr. BOILEAU. What particular harm will be done by putting this matter over a couple of weeks?

Mr. SIMMONS. If the gentleman has that much confidence in the new Congress, that they will pass it in two weeks, it would not do any harm. After the gentleman has been here as long as I have been, he will know different, and I prophesy that if this Congress does not adopt this report, this bill will not reach the President until about July 1.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, we can pass it in two hours.
Mr. SIMMONS. There is no doubt about that, but it will not be done. After the House passes it and the Senate passes it, it will remain in conference for months; mark that as a prophecy.

Mr. SCHAFER. Does the gentleman believe that the people of the District of Columbia have any right to complain about money not being appropriated for public improvements, to employ labor, when in every part of the District buildings covering blocks are springing up like mushrooms? There is more construction in the District than in five or six Western States combined.

Mr. SIMMONS. That may all be true, but yet this is money raised by the District themselves and they are asking for it. Their people are out of work. We are appropriating money to feed men who want to work, and I think it is better to give work to men, so that they may earn, than it is to give food to them.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. ALLGOOD. In keeping with the suggestion of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Schafer], $150,000,000 have been appropriated for public buildings in the District of Columbia as against $142,000,000 in all the 48 States.

Mr. SIMMONS. Oh, that is Federal appropriations. This is a city matter. We are here meeting as a town council. What town council will have money available, raised by taxes, that they propose to spend for city improvements, and sit idly by and refuse to spend it for a period of six months, when their people are hungry and begging for work? That is the question. Are you, as a member of the town council of the city of Washington going to say to-night that the people of this city for whom you speak, can not spend their own money [applause], and not be permitted to give labor to their own folks? That is the prob-

Mr. ALLGOOD. In addition to the $150,000,000 in the building program, there is a $150,000,000 Federal pay roll in the District of Columbia.

Mr. SIMMONS. Oh, this is not a Federal matter, surely the gentleman knows that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. Keller). The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has again expired.

Mr. SIMMONS. May I again urge upon the House that, in my judgment, this conference report, with some objectionable features in it, should be adopted by the Congress and should become a law at this session? [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Mapes].

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, it is the same old story. This conference report is brought in here during the closing hours of the session and then we are urged to accept it, because if we do not the legislation will fail; but I submit there is no reason in the world why the House to-night should accept this conference report unless the House approves of its provisions. [Applause.] Everybody knows we are going to reconvene here in a few days, and this bill does not take effect, or the major items in it do not, until the first of July.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Cannon], the chairman of this committee, tells me that the appropriation about which the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KVALE] inquired, $625,000 for relief of the poor in the District, does not become immediately available. It does not become effective until the 1st of July, so that there is no hurry to pass this bill on that account.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what does this bill provide? The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Cannon] says that as the bill passed the House of Representatives it contained appropriations amounting to something like $6,000,000 less than was carried in the current law. The Senate has increased that somewhat, but there are still from four to five million dollars less appropriated in this bill than was appropriated in the bill last year.

Notwithstanding the appropriation of last year, notwithstanding the low tax rate here in the District of Columbia of $17 per $1,000, there will still be a healthy surplus at the end of the year in the Federal Treasury to the credit of the District of Columbia, and by passing this legislation now with this Federal contribution for more than the House thinks the Federal Government ought to contribute just that much more will be added to the surplus in the Federal Treasury to the credit of the District of Columbia, or the tax rate of $17 per $1,000, already much below the average, will be still lower.

Mr. Speaker, does the House want to pass such legislation in view of the economic condition of the country and of the tax burden of the people outside the District of Columbia when we are all trying to reduce the appropriations of the Federal Government? Why not reduce the amount of Federal contribution, keep it down to $6,500,000, which everyone who has made a study of the situation knows is a liberal amount for the Federal Government to contribute?

Mr. Speaker, I submit that under all the circumstances this House ought to reject this conference report and wait until the next session of Congress before passing this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER].

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, differences, of course, may be expected to arise between the two legislative branches, and it is unfortunate that in the heat of debate anything should be said which in any way could be construed as reflecting on the integrity and honesty of purpose of those who differ. I share no feeling of that kind.

In reference to this bill, however, it is rather surprising that the House, which has made over a period of years such a very careful study of some of the items in this bill carrying large sums, have repeatedly concluded that we have been overcontributing to the expense of the District. The House has given strong approval to the findings of its committee, based on a careful and exhaustive study of the subject, and I question whether the other body has given the thorough study to the subject which the House has.

My reason at this time for not favoring the adoption of the conference report is due to the fact that within the last six hours it has come to the knowledge of Members of the House that the new Congress will probably be in session in less than 10 days, and surely if the early passing of this bill be a matter of importance, with the hearings so recently held, there should be no delay whatever in presenting the bill to the new Congress. I should like for the new Congress, supplemented as it will be by many new Members, to pass on the differences that have arisen between the two bodies in reference to some of the major items of this bill. I think it will be quite helpful to the old Members of the Congress to have these new Members informed of the differences that have existed and to have them express their judgment thereon. There will also be many new faces in the other body, and it would not be unwise to give them the opportunity of passing on these same differences.

I will say in reply to the gentleman from Nebraska, who calls attention to the fact that this bill makes immediately available many substantial sums that may be helpful to labor, that I think he will find if he will discuss that matter with the chairman of the committee, who is so familiar with it and whose judgment I always respect and hold in very high regard, that the reason for making these sums immediately available is not because such funds are now exhausted, but rather because they may be exhausted before the beginning of the next fiscal year. It is to prevent a possible discontinuance of work at the close of the present fiscal year that they have made such appropriations immediately available, whereas no immediate necessity has been shown or claimed.

Now, the House very wisely followed the gentleman from Missouri in the thoughtful and carefully prepared report which he submitted to the House on this bill, and no one, may I say, has ever given more careful study to this bill than has the gentleman from Missouri. I know how careful, how fair, how just he is. I feel that deep down in his heart he does not lend approval to many of the items that this conference report carries; and since it now appears that an early opportunity can be given a new jury, so to speak, to pass on this matter, I hope the House will cooperate to the end of providing an early opportunity for the new Congress to consider this bill. I see no reason why in haste we should now pass it. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered. The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the conference report.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. Cannon) there were—ayes 14, noes 102.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order there is not a quorum present.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. In view of the fact that most of the Democrats are absent celebrating the new deal, is it not highly proper for the Democratic chairman to make the point?

Mr. CANNON. I make the point of no quorum, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the point of no

So the conference report was rejected.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be sent back to conference.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the point of no quorum and object to the gentleman's request.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

HON. CHARLES W. WATERMAN

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement of Senator Schuyler, of Colorado, with reference to the life, character, and public service of the late Senator Waterman:

Charles W. Waterman, late a Senator of the United States from Colorado, was born at Waitsfield, Vt., on November 2, 1861. His parents were John and Mary Waterman, whose traditions and aspirations were the inherited legacy of gentle birth which they were to pass on inviolate. The Watermans, of course, were English as far back as the time when people first enjoyed the honor of a surname. They were the possessors of a small cottage and a few ancestral acres which yielded but scant sustenance, but by dint of the ancient virtues of toil, devotion to high principles, courage, and self-denial, they made their simple living from this Vermont soil.

How often do we read in the life history of men who have attained high position the story of their humble beginnings and of their successful struggle against handicaps of privation or physical aliment! It is one of the greatest glories of American free constitutional government that youth so handicapped may attain high place and distinction. Such lives give concrete meaning to the words of President Garfield that "A pound of pluck is worth a ton of luck," and that, under our system of government, "The lowest drop may come to mingle with the crest of the topmost wave."

Charles W. Waterman was no stranger to such conditions of youth and early manhood. Crippled suddenly at 5 years of age, for seven years he hobbled around on crutches. At 12 he age, for seven years he hobbled around on crutches. At 12 he was back again at school seeking to bridge the lost years of learning, and with feeble strength, but stanch heart, he labored early and late on his father's farm, separated not so many miles from the old homestead of the parents of our late lamented President Calvin Coolidge.

Despite such difficulties in his own education, young Waterman began to teach school himself in his late 'teens, saved a little money, and equipped himself for college education, working his way through college by doing chores, and was graduated from the University of Vermont in 1885. His alma mater conferred the honorary degree of LL D. upon him in 1922, and later honored him with membership on her board of trustees. Upon graduation, school teaching again, elected him with translation, each of the second and his extraction, and he seemed and him with membership on her board of trustees. Upon graduation, school teaching again claimed his attention, and he saved and sacrificed and worked at odd jobs at night that he might get together enough money to continue his studies. At the age of 26 years he was graduated from the University of Michigan with the degree of LL. B. While working his way through college, the young law student, in 1890, married Miss Anna B. Cook, of Burlington, Vt., a gracious and highly-esteemed girl whose lineage was no less marked with solid virtues than that of her ambittous husband and who through all his struggles remained devotedly. husband and who, through all his struggles, remained devotedly at his side, ever an inspiration. With her he shared the esteem of his home folks in old New England and the admiration and respect of firm friends in their adopted Commonwealth of Colo-

Heeding the call of the West, the late Senator determined to settle in Denver. There he was first employed in the office of the then city attorney at Denver, Hon. John F. Shafroth, who later became Representative in Congress and later United States Senator from Colorado.

Mr. Waterman's life throughout was characterized by constant, careful preparation and diligent work and energy for achievement, and the foundation of his success lay within his own sound character and great ability. These qualities soon attracted the attention of the leaders of Denver's legal fraternity, and the property of the theory is a sesistant in the offices of the them most was invited to become an assistant in the offices of the then most prominent law firm in Colorado, that of United States Senator Edward O. Wolcott and Mr. Joel F. Vaile. Later he was admitted as a member of the firm for years known as Wolcott, Vaile & Waterman, and until the death of Senator Wolcott in 1905 Mr. Waterman was the only man that was made a partner in that great law firm.

Thus associated during his early career as a lawyer with one

Thus, associated during his early career as a lawyer with one who admittedly was a great United States Senator, his ambition was stirred to attain that high position himself. From the days when he was a junior in the Wolcott & Vaile firm, his talents and services were freely at the disposal of the Republican Party in Colorado. For years every battle that developed in court involving the Republican Party's position, and there were many of them, found Mr. Waterman as the leading counsel battling for the found Mr. W party's rights.

When, therefore, in 1926, having through his long and arduous When, therefore, in 1926, having through his long and arduous service as a lawyer attained affluence and the ability to retire from further labor, he offered his services as the standard bearer of the Republican Party. The Republicans of the State demonstrated their affectionate admiration by making him their nominee, and the people of Colorado, by a large majority, added their confirmation of confidence by electing him United States Senator from Colorado. His gracious and winning personality, his perfect integrity, his ability, demonstrated by over 30 years of devotion to his profession in almost innumerable contests of vast importance, requiring the soundest judgment and the utmost of skill, combined to make it an easy step for him from private to public life. Colorado was richly dowered and honored by his acskill, combined to make it an easy step for him from private to public life. Colorado was richly dowered and honored by his acceptance of the great office and his service. Two or three years before the expiration of the term for which he was elected, he was attacked by a serious physical ailment. Despite this, and even beyond any reasonable degree of prudence, he bravely and uncomplainingly carried on his effort faithfully and fully to represent the people of the State of Colorado. Conscientious response to every duty unfailingly characterized his entire life and career. When a man has lived such a life, has throughout manifested a character as strong and sound and firm as the very granite of the State where he was born, when he has been loyal to every duty, faithful to friends and to all situations, when good will toward his fellowmen, marked with a gracious kindliness, has been the rule of his daily life, may we not find in such a life true reason to believe that death is not the end and that when he reason to believe that death is not the end and that when he departed from us on August 27, 1932, but he stepped into a finer, wider, and better scene where qualities so richly developed in what we call life, find greater opportunity? With this thought, I would say to the spirit of my departed friend, "Hall-but are forward!"

but not farewell."

TWENTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF CHRISTIAN MEN BUILDERS (INC.)

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, in our city of Indianapolis there is an organization so useful to humanity, so unique in its conception and its activities, and so outstanding in the field of Christian service that I think I am fully justified in bringing it to the attention of this House and of the country, believing, as I do, that an association of Christian men which exercises such a beautiful and wholesome influence in our community should let its light so shine that all mankind may behold it and other communities may profit by forming organizations of similar mold and pattern.

Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven—

Said the Savior of mankind, and under the broad scope of this divine injunction it would seem that one who is not a member but who is an admirer of the organization referred to may be pardoned if he enters into a brief recital of its history and the good work it is doing at a time when there is so much want and misery to be relieved and dark and lowering clouds are hanging over the world.

The organization to which I invite attention is known as Christian Men Builders (Inc.). As this speech is delivered, it is arranging to celebrate the twentieth anniversary of its birth. It came into existence in March, 1913, as an auxiliary of the Third Christian Church of our city, to which it has ever since been attached, though not under any denominational control.

There is one bright and shining name associated with this incorporated society founded on the principles which the Savior proclaimed to the world nineteen hundred years ago, and that is the name of Merle Sidener.

During 17 of the 20 years of the existence of Christian Men Builders (Inc.) Mr. Sidener has been its leader. The wisdom of this choice has never been doubted. Coming from an old-fashioned home, where Christian idealism formed the foundation for its activities, Mr. Sidener soon won the unstinted loyalty and admiration of the rapidly growing organization through his teaching and practice of commonsense Christianity as applied to daily life.

In Indianapolis and Indiana Mr. Sidener is known as a premier business man and civic leader, but he is more than that. He symbolizes the extended hand of fellowship. His idealism is intensely practical and sufficient to the needs of the community. His philosophy deals with life as it is, and his aim has been to form an organization that is capable of coping with the everyday problems of the ordinary individual with a view to helping as many persons as possible—God's run of the mine-over life's rough places. He is constantly receiving at his office calls from members and nonmembers of his class, Tom, Dick, and Harry, seeking information, advice, encouragement, and assistance. "If you have a problem, take it to Sidener," is a common expression in our town. He is always willing to listen to the visitor's story and to refer him or her to the proper person for relief. couragement and inspiration have helped innumerable young men and he has given freely and without price his own time and efforts in the service of others.

The membership of Christian Men Builders is an interesting cross section of our community. It is composed of laborers, bankers, lawyers, clerks, newspapermen, professional men of all kinds-a composite of all of the respectable and respected elements that enter into city life. It is no uncommon sight for a man with working clothes on his body to sit side by side with a banker or a carefully groomed business man. It is no place for snobs, but every true-blue man who wants an opportunity to do his bit to make this world a better place in which to live will find himself welcomed cordially and sincerely, whether he be clad in overalls or in the garments of the rich. Christian Men Builders (Inc.) heartily subscribes to the philosophy of Robert Burns-

A man's a man for a' that!

It looks at his soul and not at the cut of his garments. If he is in earnest and willing to work, he finds the door that leads to humanitarian service is wide open. In the organization to-day are Jews, Catholics, Lutherans, and members of practically every Protestant denomination, all forgetful of the narrow limitations of creed while they band themselves together in the service of the Master. Christian Men Builders (Inc.) is a nonprofit organization, nondenominational, and nonsectarian, a haven for all who wish to do worthwhile work for the relief of their fellow beings.

The organization is highly specialized, being controlled by a cabinet of eight men elected by the class at a yearly election. The officers include a president, five vice presidents in charge of departments, secretary, and treasurer. Each of the above officers has two associates who act as his assistants. Each officer is the head of his department and has complete charge of the administrative affairs of the department.

The "men builders" are active in such worthy efforts as finding employment for the jobless, visiting the sick, providing food for the hungry, and clothing for the near-naked.

To many a young man in Indianapolis, Christian Men Builders (Inc.) has given inspiration and a purpose to achieve worthily in life's struggles; to countless others, both old and young, its agencies have been a boon of priceless value in times of deepest gloom.

All of these activities are conducted in accordance with a well-ordered, systematic plan in which each worker finds his proper place. Many employers recognize the worth of the organization and give first call to Christian Men Builders when positions or jobs of any kind are open.

There are 3,000 members of the organization, and its Sunday meetings, which are broadcast over the radio, have an average attendance of over 900. High-water mark was the meeting on last Easter Sunday, when 1,875 men were present by actual count, and when it was necessary to move from the church to a theater to accommodate the large crowd. When a man enters the classroom on Sunday morning, he seems invariably to leave his "long face" on the outside, for friendliness and congeniality are in the very atmosphere. Coat-lapel cards are worn to identify the members, for in such a large class it is difficult to keep in mind the names of so many men.

Members of Christian Men Builders are intensely loyal to the organization; and wherever they may roam, they tell the story of Mr. Sidener and his class. They are now scattered throughout the world. Recently I was talking with a friend who had just returned from California and Mexico. He told me he had met Christian Men Builders in Mexico City and in many California cities, and that they were all singing the praises of this splendid Indianapolis organization. In many cities classes already have been organized on the principles governing Christian Men Builders (Inc.) by former active workers in the class.

Christian Men Builders (Inc.) is an outstanding institution of our State and its capital city; and as it enters upon its third decade of useful service, our people, thrilled with pride in it and its triumphs, are wishing it good luck and Godspeed on its way to even greater and nobler achievements

HON. ALBERT JOHNSON

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, under leave to extend my remarks I wish to call the attention of the House Members and the readers of the Congres-SIONAL RECORD to the fact that Hon. ALBERT JOHNSON, of Washington, will be severing his Membership in the House on March 4. This date will mark the final service for many very able and illustrious men.

Mr. Johnson has served in the House for 20 years and his service has marked him as a man of great ability, and his accomplishments in a legislative way have made him illustrious. It is only given to a few people to be recognized as foremost authorities-Mr. Johnson has won this distinction and there is no one to vie with him in a consideration of who is the best-posted man in Congress on matters of immigration. His long service on the Immigration Committee, as a member and as chairman, together with his lifetime study of the subject of immigration, plus the power of a brilliant mind, enabled him to win the indisputable title of being the leading authority on immigration matters in the House. His many public addresses and his prolific writings gave him a national reputation. The Congress will miss him because of his great knowledge of facts, and the country will miss him because of his mastery of this intricate yet very human subject, and his constituents will miss him because of his influence and service.

Having served on the Immigration Committee with him for eight years and knowing the esteem in which he is held by his colleagues on that committee, and by the House Members generally, I am proud of the opportunity to say these few words concerning this statesman who has given the best years of his life in the service of his country. I hope he continues to give his country the benefit of his great knowledge and versatility. And, for myself, he has my unfailing respect and esteem.

Few legislators leave their impress upon the statutory law of the land to the extent that Mr. Johnson has. The early policy of the United States was to welcome all aliens to our shores. Later, restrictions as to health and character were provided. And still later, literacy and other tests were required. But finally it was seen that those tests were not sufficient to prevent the flood of immigration that washed into our country. To Mr. Johnson must go the honor of devising a plan to prevent this devastating flood that was threatening the life of the Republic. In 1921 Congress passed the first quota law, which was the product of the mind of Mr. Johnson. This law was improved upon greatly by the Johnson Quota Act of 1924. In the passage of this act Mr. Johnson impressed himself indelibly on the statute law of our Nation. The Johnson quota law is one of the really great enactments in the life and history of the Nation. If Mr. Johnson does not choose to return to service in this House he can feel assured that his place as a legislator is safe in the annals of legislation in the House.

REPUBLICAN KEYNOTE ADDRESS

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an address delivered by myself before the Republican State convention at Buffalo, N. Y., October 3, 1932. The address is as follows:

At the outset of my remarks I want to thank Miss Butler for the gracious and charming introduction. She is known from one end of the State to the other for the effective work she has been doing among the Republican women. If all the men leaders of the party would only work one-half as hard and as intelligently, we would have no trouble in sweeping New York State from Buffalo to Montauk Point.

We are living in a financial, industrial, and economic crisis that none of us have ever read or dreamed of. Past presidential camnone of us have ever read or dreamed of. paigns and political issues have been mere fleabites compared to the importance of our present critical situation. We are in the midst of a national emergency far more serious than any period of the World War, affecting the welfare and lives of 120,000,000 Americans and civilization itself. We believe that, judging from the past, the Republican Party offers the soundest and safest solutions of our problems, and I propose to speak in considerable detail on Republican achievements and policies, and ask for your attention and indulgence attention and indulgence.

Always beyond and above party must stand the country; and whatever destiny holds in store for us, the Republican Party, no matter how determined and confident of winning, will, in victory or defeat, place the interests of America first of the Democratic State administration.

We meet here in convention assembled for the purpose of nominating a Republican State ticket that will win and to select presidential electors who will keep Herbert Hoover and a Republican administration at Washington. We are united in our determination to carry New York State for both our National and State tickets and to redeem our State from the waste and extravagance of the Democratic State administration.

We Republicans propose to place the economic issues squarely before the American people and ask for their support in carrying out the policies recommended by President Hoover to restore confidence and credit and to relieve unemployment in the midst of a world industrial crisis. The voters of all parties are more interested in safe and sound solutions of our economic problems and in regaining the paths of prosperity than in political speeches, panaceas, and vote-catching phrases.

This is the time for clear thinking and straight speaking and not for honeyed words, promises, and political buncombe. We ask the American people to carefully study and digest the program of rehabilitation proposed by the President. We are confident that if they do they will sustain these policies by voting for our courageous and constructive leader, Herbert Hoover. In his admirable speech of acceptance he laid down without evasions or qualifications a sound economic program that appealed to every American interested in the welfare of his country, regardless of partisanship. That great acceptance speech was a fair and honest recital by the President of the United States of the difficulties and accomplishments of his administration, giving credit in a sportsmanlike manace in the part of the believe the period of the part of the believe the period of the part of the believe the period of the part of the period to the part of the period to the perio ments of his administration, giving credit in a sportsmanlike manner to his political opponents in the Democratic Party for the help which they had given him during his administration. What a striking contrast to the destructive, intemperate, and often personal criticism made use of by the Democratic candidate for the Presidency in his campaign speeches.

Franklin D. Possevelt was extravited into the governor's chair Presidency in his campaign speeches.

Franklin D. Roosevelt was catapulted into the governor's chair by that great leader, Gov. Alfred E. Smith, who had instituted far-reaching reforms while chief executive, owing to his intimate knowledge of State affairs gained by his long service in the legislature. For the first two years, Governor Roosevelt simply followed in the footsteps of his illustrious predecessor and profited by his reflected glory. During the last two years, Governor Roosevelt has done nothing constructive and nothing new has emanated from him. He has, however, frowned on his courageous and constructive creator, and Alfred E. Smith, the man with perhaps the largest personal following in the United States, became the original "forgotten man" with Governor Roosevelt.

Nevertheless, former Governor Smith is still a Democrat, and up to the present moment a very still one, although he may feel compelled, for personal and political reasons, to give a perfunctory indorsement to his party candidate, which would now amount to nothing more than damning his old friend Frank with faint nothing more than damning his old friend Frank with faint

The President will speak to-morrow at Des Moines on farm relief, so it would be presumptuous for me to take your time to discuss that issue, except to point out that Governor Roosevelt in spite of general and obscure observations and vagueness approaching a total eclipse in his recent farm-relief speech at Topeka has done little or nothing to relieve the plight of the dairy farmers in his own State. Legislative relief, like charity, ought to begin at home. We have more abandoned farms in New York State than in any other State in the Union, and there will be a lot more if the protective duties provided by the last Republican tariff bill for milk. cream, dairy products, eggs, poultry, and vegetables are reduced or done away with. Let the farmers of New York State consider well where their interests are best served before going to the polls. The President will speak to-morrow at Des Moines on farm going to the polls.

going to the polls.

Governor Rooseveit's farm-relief speech at Topeka was, if possible, the yaguest and weakest of his tour. It is not to be wondered at. He claims to hail from a farm, when, in reality, it is a typical Hudson River country estate, which grows enough vegetables for home consumption and enough hay to feed the cows to furnish the milk for the family; and where he gets the corn to feed the chickens to supply the needs of his estate with eggs, I do not know, but probably from Topeka. Governor Roosevelt knows as much about farming as his illustrious predecessor, both in office and as a candidate of the Democratic Party for the Presidency, Alfred E. Smith, who learned all he knew from a car window on his way West in the 1928 campaign to deliver a speech on agricultural relief at Omaha. relief at Omaha.

The proposal made by Governor Roosevelt to put a million men to work on reforestation of abandoned farms was typical of his lack of knowledge of the farm, forest, and unemployment problems; and, after receiving the biggest laugh of the campaign, it disappeared under a shower of adverse criticism and ridicule.

I do not believe in playing politics with human misery, but the governor had no justification for advancing such a grotesque scheme without being called to account. He dare not persist in such an absurdity without making himself ridiculous and a laughing stock to the farmers and the unemployed. I challenge him to prove how he can secure employment for one-tenth the number of men he mentioned in his reforestation proposal.

BONUS

As one of the original members of the American Legion, and as one who helped frame the Legion's preamble and constitution and voted in the Congress for the adjusted compensation act, I bespeak whole-hearted support of the President for his courageous stand against the payment of $2,400,000,000 to able-bodied veterans in the present financial crisis, which would result in a serious and disastrous shock to our whole economic structure and the undermining of our national credit, upon which foundation our economic recovery is based. economic recovery is based.

I yield to no one in my loyalty to the American Legion nor in my belief in the patriotism of its members, but I am abundantly my belief in the patriotism of its members, but I am abundantly convinced that the American people are overwhelmingly in accord with the views expressed by President Hoover and also by Alfred E. Smith and Norman Thomas against payment at this time. A situation may develop when Congress convenes in December that would require the enactment of emergency legislation to afford monetary relief to the unemployed and needy veterans out of the balance of their adjusted-service certificates to be paid in monthly installments for a period of not more than one year. This could probably be financed without endangering the public credit or creating further unemployment.

We have favored liberal compensation for all veterans who were disabled in line of duty during any war in which the United States was engaged, and for their widows and orphans.

The President never did a more courageous act than when he

The President never did a more courageous act than when he opposed the immediate payment of the bonus, and the people of the United States honor him for it. Men and women in America despise trimmers and condemn ducking and pussyfooting in men seeking high official position. Courage was not lacking in another and greater Roosevelt—in Theodore Roosevelt, who was elected to the Presidency and who because of his courage retained the love and faith of the American people to his dying day.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

Moratorium: President Hoover was viciously attacked from various sources when he instituted the moratorium on German reparations payments last year, but time has demonstrated the necessity for such action, which has been approved at home and abroad and acclaimed by people of German origin in this country. I quote from out of the mouth of one of our foremost political abroad and acclaimed by people of German origin in this country. I quote from out of the mouth of one of our foremost political opponents, Jouett Shouse, former chairman of the Democratic National Committee, who stated in a speech in Omaha shortly after the moratorium went into effect:

"President Hoover's request for a 1-year moratorium in intergovernmental debts was the only thing he could have done."

The moratorium saved the young German Republic from being overthrown by the Hitlerites on the right and the communists on the left, who were willing to combine in destroying the Republic, but ready to spring at each other's throats at a moment's notice and bring ruin and disaster to world peace and stability.

War debts: The President and the Republican Party are opposed to cancellation of war debts. The United States was not responsible for the World War, and had no part in its origin. We sent 2,000,000 troops to the battlefields of Europe and turned the tide of defeat into victory. After the armistice we brought our troops home. We asked for nothing and got exactly what we asked—nothing at all—no indemnities, no reparations, no plunder, no conquered territories. The American people do not understand why they should now be called on to carry the entire financial burden of the World War. Let the nations of Europe reduce their enormous budgets for military and naval armaments before asking for further reductions of their war debts. Why, we are only asking from France repayment of the money we loaned her after the armistice, and from Italy only 25 cents on the dollar.

RADICALISM

The President has repeatedly appealed to the country during this national emergency to remain true to its fundamental principles and ideals, and not to be carried away by new, false, and imported doctrines and the blatant loud speakers of socialism and radicalism. We Republicans have no use for any form of socialism, communism, fascism, or foreign dictatorship in the United

We adhere to the early principles of our party, as enunciated by Abraham Lincoln in his immortal Gettysburg speech—a gov-ernment of the people, by the people, and for the people—and that does not mean government by any class or minority of the people.

The aims of the immoderate radicals under the guise of progressive policies lead directly to State socialism and would result in confiscation of property by the State. What is needed at this time is return to sound Americanism and the early principles of the Republican Party and our political faith, the very corner stone of which is that human rights are superior to property rights. The Republican attitude toward private property is the same to-day as it was in 1864, when Lincoln spoke the following words before the Workingmen's Association of New York:

"Let not him who is homeless pull down the house of another, but let him work diligently and build one for himself, and thus, for example, assure that his own shall be safe from violence when

We still believe in the sanctity of private property and oppose the extension of Government ownership. We favor effective and rigid regulation of public utilities and interstate electrical power under the Federal Power Commission to protect and safeguard the interests of the public. The consuming public must be protected in this State from monopolistic water-power utilities.

T.ABOR

The President has conciliated both capital and labor to a larger degree than any previous administration and has secured their cooperation even in this period of stress, with the result that there have been few strikes and little disorder. He has consistently urged the 5-day week and shorter hours for labor and upheld the American standard of wages.

He has equally consistently opposed the dole which has brought economic ruin and disaster to Germany and England and wherever it has been tried. The dole may start on a carefully considered basis but it eventually becomes a political football and places a premium on idleness and an enormous burden upon the taxpayers, industry, and the government.

From the very beginning of the depression the President has sought to maintain the American standard of living. He stopped sought to maintain the American standard of living. He stopped immigration by Executive order to promote the employment of American citizens. He has insisted on tariffs that would protect free American labor from the flood of cheap goods from Europe and Asia and from the products of forced labor in Russia.

In this State we should insist during the period of depression that preference on all State, county, and municipal work, and in private industry wherever possible, should be given to American citizens. There should be no compromise or evasion of this issue. Remembering the words of Abraham Lincoln, our first Republican President, when he said: "Labor is prior to capital."

I favor New York State, the greatest industrial State in the Republic, taking the lead in working out a careful, constructive, and conservative program of industrial security insurance, when we get back to normal times, in order to provide our wage earners with conservative program of industrial security insurance, when we get back to normal times, in order to provide our wage earners with adequate health, life, and retirement insurance. Many of our great industrial corporations have already put into effect various forms of group insurance. I propose that our State should establish and supervise a uniform code for security insurance to be applied to all corporations employing over 50 employees. I do not refer to the dole or to any form of unemployment insurance.

I venture this suggestion entirely on my own responsibility as it is close to my heart and one which, I believe, since we have turned from an agricultural to the largest industrial and mass production Nation in the world, to be absolutely essential to the future welfare of our wage earners, and to industry itself. If there is any criticism of this part of my remarks, I assume the entire blame and am ready now and in the future to uphold and there is any criticism of this part of my remarks, I assume the entire blame and am ready now and in the future to uphold and defend it.

The biggest tragedy of the depression has been the dropping of faithful employees, through no fault of their own, on a day's notice, who have labored 20 or 30 years or more, often for the same firm in building up the wealth and prosperity of the Nation, without any retirement pay to maintain a home and family. Such a situation must not be permitted to exist under our economic system in the future. It is not right or just to American wage earners in the greatest and richest industrial country in the entire history of the known world.

I bespeak a sympathetic consideration of the need for security insurance and thereby helping to eliminate the economic fear and dread from off the back of American labor. Let us strive for a more equitable distribution of wealth and to establish human rights on a parity with property rights in the United States of America.

America.

President Hoover has inaugurated a program of Federal building to stimulate industry and allay unemployment. He has mobilized public opinion to take care of the distress among the unemployed. He helped obtain the passage of legislation in Congress authorizing the distribution of 80,000,000 bushels of wheat and 500,000 bales of cotton, owned and held in storage by the Government, to be distributed free by the American Red Cross wherever there was need to relieve human misery and suffering among our own people.

It would be superfluous for me to comment on the well-known and now historical relief measures of the world's greatest relief administrator, in Belgium, and immediately after the World War in Poland and adjoining countries. Our citizens of Belgian, German, Polish, and Austrian descent have not forgotten his humanitarian efforts in behalf of their native lands during their hour of misery and hunger, and are still eager for an opportunity to show their appreciation. Here in Buffalo, where there is a large population of German origin, it is right and fitting to recall the active support given by the then Secretary of Commerce, Herbert Hoover, in favor of the passage of the bill I introduced in the House of Representatives authorizing the expenditure of $10,-000,000 to provide foodstuffs for the starving women and children in Germany back in 1924.

I urge the wholehearted support of the referendum to be submitted on election day providing $30,000,000 for unemployment relief, and if that is not sufficient, I favor the enactment of a 1 per cent sales tax by the State of New York for a period of one year to provide adequate emergency unemployment relief if the conditions warrant such legislation during the approaching winter. No American citizen or members of his family must be permitted to be without ample food, shelter, clothing, or fuel during the rigors of the winter months. We are still the wealthiest State in the richest Nation of the world, and we do not propose, in case of a breakdown or failure of private and municipal relief, to permit our citizens to suffer from hunger or destitution.

TARIFF

We meet in a great commercial and industrial city, whose progress and growth, like the development of its sister city, Rochester, and that of New York State, is largely due to a protective tariff now assailed and menaced by the attacks of the Democratic candidate for the Presidency.

The American protective system has built up the industries of the United States, and the attitude of Governor Roosevelt puts in peril the welfare of our wage earners. There is no such thing as an ideal or perfect tariff, but Republicans can be best trusted to iron out any defects.

Always remember that over one-half of our imports come in duty free. Most European countries have erected tariff barriers considerably higher than our own. Except for Governor Roose-velt, even the Democrats have come to accept our tariff policy veit, even the Democrats have come to accept our tarin policy as being in the interest of American labor.

His solution of the tariff problem is reciprocity or a mutual swapping of goods with foreign countries. For example, to sell agricultural machinery made in Poughkeepsie to Canada in return for Canadian milk, cream, dairy products, eggs, poultry, and vegetables. Ask the farmers in New York State who are ekeing out a precarious living, or the dairyman, how such a plan would expect to them.

appeal to them.

For the past 50 years, under a Republican protective system, our wage earners have been the best paid, the best housed, the best clothed, and the best fed and most contented in the world. We propose, when we emerge from the depression as emerge we will, to uphold the high standard of wages and living of the American people.

RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION

There has been much misinformation spoken and written regarding the activities of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, generally emanating from soreheads, those with political axes to grind, and from partisan sources. When our economic and credit structure was on the verge of collapse in the early part of the year, the Congress, on the recommendation of the President, set up as an emergency measure, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and made available $4,000,000,000 to loan on good collateral to our own industries, such as railroads, banks, life-insurance companies and building and loan associations, and for selfcompanies, and building and loan associations, and for self-liquidating purposes, and to States and municipal agencies to furnish relief.

furnish relief.

Almost overnight, by the very existence of this governmental institution, backed by huge funds, the fear of economic and monetary paralysis disappeared, credit was restored, and money came out of hoarding. The record of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation speaks for itself. Seventy per cent of the bank loans have been made to banks in cities under 5,000 population, 78 per cent in cities under 10,000, and 85 per cent in cities under 25,000. Or, in other words, these loans have gone almost exclusively to maintain the credit of the butcher, baker, grocer, and farmer in small communities and not, as partisan or disgrunted opponents have said, to the big bankers. With practically only one exception, the big banks in the large cities are solvent and have enormous deposits and reserve credits.

PROHIBITION

The Republican national platform, as interpreted and clarified by the President in his acceptance speech, appealed to the sound common sense of the American people, because it was clearvisioned, sane, and constructive.

The Republican Party is opposed to the return of the saloon, that ancient center of vice and political corruption. We favor, however, submitting to conventions in the several States a change however, submitting to conventions in the several States a change in the Constitution by which we restore control of the liquor problem to the various States, with a simple safeguard against the return of the old saloon, and reserving to the Federal Government the power to protect dry States against the invasion of liquor from wet States. The people should have a clear-cut opportunity to pass judgment on this great controversial issue that affects their lives, their property, their health, their habits, their welfare, and their personal liberty.

This issue must be taken out of politics, and the President's acceptance speech shows that he is determined to do so. The sooner the States are allowed to deal with the problem as their citizens may determine the better for the country. The Republican Party is pledged to press this issue to a decision.

In view of the continued lynching of negroes in Southern States, the increase in peonage, the disfranchisement, segregation, and Jim Crowing of the entire negro population south of the Mason-Dixon line, it is inconceivable that free American negroes in the North will desert the party of Abraham Lincoln to put into power a party dominated by southern Democrats and help elect as Vice President John Nance Garner, who fought the antilynching bill, appropriations for Howard University, and the bill I introduced to erect a monument in France in commemoration of the heroism and supreme sacrifice of colored soldiers of the Ninety-third Division.

APPOINTMENTS FROM THE STATE OF NEW YORK

APPOINTMENTS FROM THE STATE OF NEW YORK

I need not elaborate on the distinguished record and eminent services of Henry L. Stimson as Secretary of State in the cause of world peace and limitation of armament, which is known throughout the world. Nor need I attempt to add laurels to those already won by Ogden L. Mills, our great Secretary of the Treasury, for his consummate handling of present financial difficulties and his insistence on the maintenance of the gold standard and the credit of the United States. Two of the candidates before the convention, both distinguished veterans of the World War, held responsible offices under Republican administrations, and both rendered splendid public service—Col. William J. Donovan, as Assistant Attorney General, and Trubee Davison, as Assistant Secretary of War for Aviation. Their records speak eloquently for them.

With complete disregard of partisanship, President Hoover appointed Judge Benjamin N. Cardozo, a Democrat and the most distinguished jurist in the State of New York, as Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, which appointment has been acclaimed throughout the Nation.

Another appointment that has shown that the President was a good judge of men was the selection of Edward Corsi, a World War veteran of Italian origin and head of the Columbian Italian League, in recognition of his high character and valuable services as a welfare worker as United States Commissioner of Immigra-tion at Ellis Island, where he has shown marked ability and made an enviable record in a distinctly difficult position.

I take this opportunity to commend the splendid leadership of my distinguished colleague, Bertrand H. Snell, in the House of Representatives. As Republican floor leader he demonstrated time and again the highest order of ability, fairness, and statesmanship, and, what is rarer still, courage and sound common sense, and made the Garner machine look not like wild jackasses, but like jack rabbits, or rather, as one well-known editor stated, as jackass rabbits. as jackass rabbits.

It would not be fair to the Republicans of this State if I did not also commend the remarkable record made by our own able State chairman, Kingsland Macy, who, through tireless effort and unlimited energy, has in a relatively short space of time built up our party so that to-day we stand united, militant, and aggressive, determined to be victorious and to carry our State and national ticket.

GARNERISM

GARNERISM

I am constrained to give more attention to Mr. Garner than he is entitled to, not only because he is Speaker of the House of Representatives but also because back of him is something much more serious—the true spirit of the Democratic Party—the same spirit that was demonstrated time and again by practically all of the Members of the Democratic House of Representatives and of the Democrats in the Senate, with very few exceptions, and the spirit of those prominently identified and associated with Franklin Roosevelt in this campaign—and that is an utter disregard of the acute financial crisis in the United States and a will repress to the acute financial crisis in the United States and a Willingness to raid the Treasury, issue flat money, and generally destroy the sources of governmental revenue and unbalance the Budget.

sources of governmental revenue and unbalance the Budget.

If you want a test of what the Democrats will do if given power, just review the measures urged and passed by them in the House of Representatives at the last session of Congress, and you will then have some conception of what a calamity their advent to power would mean to the country. Under Garner leadership the Democratic majority in the House broke down on the tax and on the economy bill. The Treasury thereby lost millions.

Under the leadership of Mr. Garner the Democrats passed a gigantic pork bill which he fathered personally. This bill was a political monstrosity and provided for new post-office buildings at every crossroad, and would have destroyed any chance of balancing the Budget. In that same bill Garner provided for pork drippings by loans to individuals. This met President Hoover's emphatic veto.

Under Garner's leadership the House passed the bill to pay yet-emphatic veto.

Under Garner's leadership the House passed the bill to pay veterans $2,400,000,000 in adulterated money. In brief, any scheme for fiat money, inflation, or promising distribution of pork appealed to Garner, whose leadership brought quick response for raids on the Public Treasury. As old Ben Tillman once said of his Democratic colleagues, "The Democratic wild donkeys break into the green corn whenever they get into power."

I say without fear of successful contradiction that the philosophy of "Pork Barrel" Jack Garner typifies the Democratic spirit and attitude toward the use of public funds in the Treasury of the United States and presents an unmistakable warning of what an orgy of waste and extravagance is to be expected in case of Democratic victory.

Democratic victory.

It is hardly fair to pick on this deserving Democrat from out of the Southwest, who was forced on the ticket by William Gibbs McApoo, former Director General of the Railroads, and who thinks all of us in the East wear horns and should pay an exorbitant pro-portion of the Federal taxes and thereby relieve the tax burden of Southern States.

I hestate to stir up further flames of ridicule that have already scorched the pathetic figure made by the Speaker of the House in his double candidacy for reelection as Member of Congress and as Vice President. Let him speak for himself: "I can deal with Hoover," shouted Mr. Garner in a speech to home folk on his return from Washington, but strangely enough he is not even allowed by the Democratic campaign managers to go on the stump. The fact is, Speaker Garner dealt successfully with neither Mr. Hoover nor the Congress, and everyone knows it. Let the people decide if he is a safe and proper man to take a chance with in an office that might lead to the Presidency.

The newspapers report that Mr. Garner may speak in New York State. We assure him of a hearty welcome and invite him to visit us and make all the campaign speeches he wants provided he will tell us where he stands on the bonus, the sales tax, and on soaking the taxpayers of New York State for the maintenance of the rest of the Union, and explain to our perplexed minds the need of new post-office buildings in every village and hamlet in the Repubnew post-office buildings in every village and hamlet in the Republic, and describe to the colored population how much he loves them and what he intends to do for them in the next Congress.

GOVERNOR ROOSEVELT

I come from the same congressional district as the Democratic candidate for the Presidency and have known him for a long time. I urge that there be no mud slinging or personal abuse indulged in during the present campaign, and further hope that both parties will repudiate the slightest attempt to create any kind of religious or racial test for any candidate for office in New York State. There is no room for intolerance in our great State. The only test for any office, beyond purely party affiliation, should be the character, experience, fitness, and ability of the candidate and the issues involved.

Governor Roosevelt, in his acceptance speech at Chicago on July 2, said: "I have many things on which I want to make my position clear at the earliest possible moment in this campaign—and you can accept my pledge that I will leave no doubt or ambiguity on where I stand on any question of moment in this campaign." Three months have gone by since then and only campaign." Three months have gone by since then and only one month is left before election day, but the Democratic candidate for the Presidency continues strangely silent on many of the most vital issues before the Nation.

most vital issues before the Nation.

In his swing around the country he has made numerous speeches, used multitudinous platitudes and glittering generalities, and proposed nostrums ad nausea, like a quack doctor, for every conceivable ill, but has failed lamentably to present a constructive program for unemployment and farm relief, national economy and economic recovery, which are the paramount issues of the

In spite of his statement that he would leave no doubt or ambi-In spite of his statement that he would leave no doubt or amni-guity on where he stands on any important question, he refuses to inform the public his position on such vital issues as the bonus, sales tax, dole, and duty on sugar, and presumably on copper, oil, lumber, and coal.

In his Columbus speech, Governor Roosevelt, in attacking the administration, quoted liberally from Alice in Wonderland, consequently it should be in order, in view of his astounding silence on important issues and his verbosity in fault finding and destructive criticism, to remind him of the conversation between the Walrus and the Carpenter in Alice Through the Looking Glass. "The time has come," the Walrus said, "to talk of many things; of shoes and ships and sealing wax, of cabbages, and kings, and why the sea is boiling hot and whether pigs have wings." Perhaps the governor can think up a few more vague generalizations before election day to amuse the people with and cover up his silence on the main issues.

the main issues.

The Federal Government has already enacted laws effective last July requiring salary reductions ranging from 8½ to 15 per cent. It seems quite remarkable, in New York State, where the burden of taxation is heaviest, for we pay almost one-third of the revenue of the Federal Government, that Governor Roosevelt has failed to recommend any legislation calling for the reduction in the salaries of State officials, including his own. How can he consistently talk of reducing Federal expenditures when he has neglected to reduce State expenditures in line with the program established by the Federal Government? He has had ample time and opportunity to do his bit to relieve the crushing burden of taxation in New York State and to cut his own salary, together with his numerous bureau chiefs, but to date has said nothing and done nothing. What a contrast with President Hoover, who voluntarily reduced his salary 20 per cent, and even Mayor McKee, of New York City, who has reduced his 40 per cent.

On the vital question of governmental economy Governor Roosevelt can only be judged by his record as chief executive of New York State. Figures show very clearly that he has been the most reckless spender of any governor in the history of our State. In 1922, under Governor Miller, the State budget was $133,159,710.24. After 10 consecutive years of Democratic governors, the budget in 1931 amounted to $328,140,894.91, or an increase of 150 per cent. Ye shades of Calvin Coolidge! The budget in 1928, during the last year of the Smith administration, was $232,643,701.10, and under Roosevelt it has jumped approximately $100,000,000.

In one of his many speeches Governor Roosevelt accused the Republican administration of not reducing the war debts at a sufficiently drastic rate. The truth is that he did not have the faintest idea of what he was talking about. The facts are that the war debts were reduced at the gigantic and unparalleled rate of about a billion dollars a year from 1920 to 1929. The Federal Government has already enacted laws effective last faintest idea of what he was talking about. The facts are that the war debts were reduced at the gigantic and unparalleled rate of about a billion dollars a year from 1920 to 1929.

In another fiery speech he dilated on the need of Federal regulation of the stock exchange, but for four years in office he did not raise his voice to call for State regulation or make any move against the great New York Stock Exchange. Governor Roosevelt was in a position to urge regulation of stock-market securities in the midst of the greatest orgy of gambling and inflation the country has ever known, but he did nothing until three years later, when he tried to protect himself by seeking to blame the President. It is well to remind the governor that one ounce of prevention at the time is worth a ton of talk or promises later on. On such a record he is the last man entitled to urge Federal on. On such a record he is the last man entitled to urge Federal regulation of stock exchanges.

He also charged the administration with resorting to "the type of inflation which has weakened public confidence in our Government credit." Again the record proves that all the inflationary measures in the past Congress were introduced and supported by Democrats in both the House and Senate in direct opposition to the views of the President.

the views of the President.

I plead for a campaign based upon facts; not upon figments of the imagination or misrepresentation of the issues.

The economic program of the Democratic Party, like the Cheshire cat, is of a vanishing type. Sometimes you see its tail and sometimes its grinning head, and you may even get a glimpse of part of its body; but the real cat, when you approach it, like the Democratic program for recovery, does not exist. In good American slang, there ain't no such animal.

The fact is, Governor Roosevelt has no effective program for economic recovery. His nostrums lead only to a blind alley. I am again reminded of a ditty in Alice Through the Looking Glass, where the White Knight said: "But I was thinking of a plan to dye one's whiskers green, and always use so large a fan that they where the White Knight said: "But I was thinking of a plan to dye one's whiskers green, and always use so large a fan that they could not be seen." The White Knight of Democracy owes it to the American people to let them know without further evasions where he stands on the bonus, sales tax, dole, sugar tariff, salary slashes, and national economy, and if he has any plan to relieve unemployment.

HERBERT HOOVER

We stand on a platform upholding and commending the achievements of the able, clean, honest, constructive, and sound administration of Herbert Hoover, while our opponents depend on discontent. There has never been a cleaner administration or one freer from scandal since the foundation of the Republic.

We are in the midst of the greatest financial crisis the world has ever seen. Foreign financiers, the foreign press, and foreign diplomats have sought to drive this country off the gold standard the production of the greatest standard than the sound discontinuous country of the gold standard than the standard than the diplomats have sought to drive this country off the gold standard and undermine and discredit our monetary values, but thanks to the watchfulness and the wisdom of our President the gold standard has been maintained and our national credit unimpaired.

The President has averted national ruin and disaster, he has checked the depression, and is leading us back on the road to recovery. At this very moment Herbert Hoover is the greatest asset of our Republic.

In this hour of distress and unemployment is the man in the shop, on the farm, or in the street willing to exchange experience in national and international affairs for experimentation? Let us rather stand steadfast and hold on to what has been done to protect our home owners, to safeguard our credit and industry, and not turn back after having found the highway to economic recovery. The great danger in this crisis is inexperience in national affairs and can not be too strongly stressed. Fellow in national affairs and can not be too strongly stressed. Fellow delegates, carry back home this message to your people and to all American wage earners and ask them who is the best fitted through experience and political training to administer the affairs of the Government and whose election would benefit their own interest and the public welfare most, and the answer will be: Hold on to Hoover

No President except Lincoln has been so beset with trials and difficulties as has Herbert Hoover. For nearly three years he has had to contend with the greatest economic crisis that the world has ever known, and he has devoted his great ability and untiring energy to meeting the situation and solving the problems on a sound and constructive basis. He has remained at his post of duty day in and day out, without rest and without complaint. He has met every issue squarely and courageously, and his only motive, thought, and wish has been to serve his country best and act for the welfare of all the American people.

and act for the welfare of all the American people.

It is no time, in the midst of our national emergency to swap horses in midstream, particularly when the storm is abating and return to prosperity is in sight. The American people will not throw their pilot overboard as the ship of state is entering into the harbor of safety, national well-being, and peace.

Like Washington, Jefferson, Lincoln, and Theodore Roosevelt, he has been reviled and traduced by ambitious and disgruntled men and political partisans, but their shafts have fallen harmless. Herbert Hoover stands to-day as the greatest living American and the greatest humanitarian of our age. And he will be reelected to finish the work of reconstruction and recovery, because the American people have faith in his experience, ability, and sound courageous leadership.

REPUBLICAN PARTY

Ours is the only national party of service, of constructive legis lation, of sound money, of a protective tariff, and of practical economy and wise statesmanship; whereas the Democratic Party has been forced to abandon every position taken on the great issues in past campaigns. The whole warp and whoop of the Democratic campaign this year has been deception, demagogy, and depression, and without any definite program to help solve our ent difficulties.

There rests upon all Republicans in this presidential year a solemn duty, particularly in our State, to dedicate a portion of his or her time, talent, and energy to upholding Republican principles and electing Republican candidates. I have an abiding faith in the Republican Party and in the judgment and clear thinking of the American people in such a national emergency. They may be temporarily led astray by false and radical leaders, but will always return to true principles and belief in party responsibility.

Let us give thanks on this two hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington that we are American citizens and belong to the party that has kept faith with Lincoln. Let us rededicate ourselves to the proposition that a government of the people, by the people, and for the people shall not perish from this earth, because it is the fairest, soundest, most honorable and best government devised by the mind of man, and history proves that the common welfare is best served and the country is safest in the hands of the Republican Party.

LINCOLN AND THE PROBLEM OF 1933

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I am printing herewith an address delivered by myself before the Principals' Club of Pittsburgh on February 11, 1933. It is as follows:

Mr. Chairman and friends, on February 11, 1861, just 72 years ago to-day, Abraham Lincoln bade farewell to his friends in Springfield, Ill., and began his journey to Washington, where he was to assume the duties of the Presidency in a time of gathering storm.

Seventy-two years before that day George Washington was pre-paring to enter upon the mighty task of bringing order out of chaos and building a united nation under a new and untried constitution.

constitution.

Let me suggest to you that the problem faced by Washington and Lincoln is fundamentally the same as that which America faces to-night. In that critical time before the United States Government was established under the Constitution the danger was disunion. Americans had lost the common purpose which inspired them through the war for independence. They were divided and antagonistic. Many leaders in the different States protested against the formation of a central government embodying the will of all the people of all the States.

They believed that a part could prosper to a greater degree than the whole. The great task of Washington was to cure divisions and lead Americans to cooperate for common ends.

In February, 1861, the danger was political disunion, due to the honestly held but mistaken idea that slavery was such a profitable system that secession was justified in order to preserve it.

serve it.

It was a tragic mistake. Slavery was not profitable, save to a very few owners of great plantations. Even those favored few would have been bankrupted in a few years by the superior efficiency of free labor. They were blind men who brought disaster in Lincoln's time.

Now, in February, 1933, the danger is economic disunion, due to the honestly held but mistaken idea that an unrestrained com-petitive system is so profitable that the evils of a nation-racking depression must be endured in order to preserve it.

That also is a tragic mistake. Jungle competition is not profitable save to a very few victors in the conflict. Even those favored few stand in peril of losing all their winnings by the breakdown of the system itself. If disaster comes, these greedy, blind ones will be responsible.

of the system itself. If disaster comes, these greedy, blind ones will be responsible.

It was a critical time 72 years ago when Lincoln was passing through many cities, including Pittsburgh. Several States had seceded from the Union. Plans were under way for the organization of the Confederate States of America. President Buchanan in the White House was helplessly watching the approach of disaster. A lame-duck Congress was drifting aimlessly, unable to formulate an effective program. Fear and uncertainty weighed down the hearts of Americans.

Study of the brief speeches made by Lincoln on that momentous journey and of the inaugural address of March 4 is a valuable patriotic exercise to-day. I have gone over them in order to find the purpose and the spirit of this greatest American as he faced his mighty problem.

mighty problem.

In those messages are to be found the dynamic ideals and purposes which sustained Lincoln during the next four years. With malice toward none, with tenderness and yet with firmness, he pointed out to his fellow countrymen the true pathway which must be followed, whether in sunshine or in storm.

First. He knew the problem and faced it clearly. The Union must be preserved, no matter what action was needed.

Second. He had an open mind as to methods, willing to meet new conditions with new remedies.

new conditions with new remedies.

Third. His mind was bold. He did not fear to act when ruin was the certain result of drifting.

Fourth. His heart was friendly. He sought to put the golden rule into action.

Fifth. He had faith in the people, in the Republic, and in God. To-night a new generation of Americans faces the problem of an industrial breakdown, which has resulted in the enforced idle-ness of 12,000,000 competent and willing workers. From unem-ployment has sprung human misery, unbearable strains, bankruptcles, want, and woe. Our economic house, divided against itself, has been threatening to split apart. Our greatest task now is to restore it and thus establish an economic union which will provide the means whereby those who live within it may have food, clothing, shelter, and such comforts as our resources permit. That must be the goal to-day, and it must be seen as clearly and pursued as devotedly as did Lincoln in his day. We must establish this economic union or witness the destruction of the political union for which Lincoln strove.

What causes this unemployment which is to-day's root evil?

If you ask professional economists that question you may get any 1 of 40 answers. Let me be rash enough to answer it in one word—the word which wrung the heart of Lincoln—disunion.

Two things comprise our economic system—the production of goods on one side and their just distribution on the other. They are so disunited, so out of balance, that we have starvation in the midst of surpluses.

No one denies that America can produce enough to furnish every family in the land with food, clothing, shelter, and manifold comforts. We have great resources, mighty machines, tremendous man power, and a billion horsepower in addition. By the means now in existence we can produce more food than we can eat, build more houses than we can use, and make more clothing than we can wear.

can wear.

This ability to produce is not enough, as the present depression proves. The spectacle of 30,000,000 Americans forced to exist on charity while warehouses burst with supplies is tragic testimony that production is worse than useless without distribution. Trace that situation back and you will find the forces of disunion at work. For many years free and unrestricted competition in production was the very bone and sinew of American industrial philosophy. It was almost universally believed that when men pursued their own gain exclusively, they unconsciously but certainly served the public good.

The tracic thing is that when our entire economic and indus-

The tragic thing is that when our entire economic and industrial world was transformed there was scarcely any change in American thinking and in business conduct. We conquered the ontinent until every foot was in somebody's possession, yet the old frontier ideas remained. We built factories and dug mines and cultivated farms until great surplus supplies brought disaster, but still the old copy-book maxims from the time of scarcity retained their power. The bulls and bears of Wall Street, the predatory financiers, the cutthroat competitors, all followed the slogans of stark individualism in a new day which demanded control and concernitum. Our antitrust laws passed in 1800 to control and cooperation. Our antitrust laws, passed in 1890 to meet conditions in the era of scarcity, were made effective in the era of abundance. The change in conditions was so great that the individuals, corporations, and groups that acted solely for their own gain, instead of advancing the public welfare destroyed that welfare.

The President's committee on recent social trends, which reported last month, stated the situation by declaring that social invention has not kept pace with mechanical invention. These students of conditions sent forth a thrilling call for the preservation of the Union when they declared that the United States must be a "single society based upon the common welfare as the goal of common effort."

One social invention needed now is a governor on our industrial and economic system. If we can devise an effective method of control of industrial competition, production, and investment, we can emerge from the swamp and the perilous peaks of boom times will be cut down and the gulf of depression will be filled in. We are in the deepest gulf we have ever known. It is a national emergency, more serious than war. I propose that Congress recognize the fact and proclaim the existence of the emergency and the necessity for control of every basic industry affected with a public interest.

a public interest.

A national emergency advisory council should be appointed

A national emergency advisory council should be appointed representing the various industrial, social, and labor interests. This council should develop the general program for the coordination of the basic industries of the country.

There should be a national emergency stabilization board which should classify the industries affected with a public interest in this emergency. These industries should be empowered to establish trade boards, which would cooperate in balancing production and consumption through the establishment of price and production schedules tion schedules.

The stabilization board should issue licenses to business enterprises in the industries affected. There should be a deliberate purpose to see that every willing worker has a chance to work at fair wages determined by collective bargaining.

This license power would stabilize industry, for without it the factory or mine would not be able to ship goods nor would it be able to secure credit through Government agencies.

The trade boards within the industry would establish price and production schedules. They would form associations and market-

The trade boards within the industry would establish price and production schedules. They would form associations and marketing pools for joint action without regard to anti-trust laws. The United States stabilization board would act as an umpire and have veto power but there would be a vast field of action left to the industry itself. Agriculture would be included in this plan. Let the farmers organize to control production exactly the same as other producers. They would make production balance with the requirements and establish a fair price for their products, under the cooperation of this Government. No price-fixing scheme will help without control of production in the wheat industry any more than in the bituminous-coal industry. Transportation must be controlled as one system. Trucks and Wheat industry any more than in the bituminous-coal industry. Transportation must be controlled as one system. Trucks and busses compete unfairly with the railroads and this has helped to bring about our situation.

I do not forget that technocracy professes to be able to prevent these perilous ups and more perilous downs. They would abolish the entire price system, which means capitalism, and drive out the politicians so that engineers may take complete control.

Howard Scott, chief technocrat, says, "Politicians are things of the past."

That announcement has a persuasive appeal. seems to be no one so poor as to do reverence to the politician. The average person is like Hamlet gazing on the skull and remarking "This might be the pate of a politician, one who would circumvent God."

Perhaps it would not be inappropriate to-night if I called to mind that Abraham Lincoln was a politician. His lifelong interest was in politics. Not a closet student of the science of government was this man we honor and revere, but a candidate for many political offices, asking the votes of his fellow citizens.

The technocrats have rendered a real service by their survey of industry and their emphasis on the rapidity with which machine production has been proceeding. But they must remember that when they come to set down their remedy in legislation they are politicians. They distinctly disavow violence and revolution by force of arms. Then they must go into politics in order to abolish the price system and establish their energy-payment basis. They must surely be in politics with their class dictatorship of scientists and engineers.

I agree that this automobile of capitalism, which has carried

I agree that this automobile of capitalism, which has carried us so far, is missing fire and jerking and threatens to stall. I do not believe that we must therefore scrap the car. The trouble is in the carburetor. There is an unbalanced mixture of the air and gas or, in other words, production and purchasing power. If the proper balance can be made by adjustment, the car will give admirable service for a long time.

Present conditions are not warrant for destroying our economic system. They are unanswerable argument for the instal-lation of a proper control upon a system out of control. We are not going to be satisfied with the production of 1929 as a permanent standard. America needs new communities, new roads, new trades, better homes and ships, shorter hours of labor, more leisure, and more comfort. Stabilization of production does not mean less production but ever-increasing output.

mean less production but ever-increasing output.

I maintain that if business enterprises are a part of an organized industry, in which the industry and Government cooperate as to production and price, they will find an abundance of credit. If we can bring order out of chaos in production by sound stabilization, the currency and credit problem, to a large degree, will solve itself. Until that action is taken manipulation of the currency will bring only temporary relief for the currency will not continue to circulate.

There will be many difficulties in organizing the economic system and putting it under control. Lincoln had no map or chart of the future in 1861 but he reached his goal.

If Lincoln was right when he said, "This country with its institutions belongs to the people who inhabit it," then the time is ripe to take control of industry and make it serve the people.

America is going to undertake that mighty task. We are going to establish an economic union by voluntary agreement as far as to establish an economic union by voluntary agreement as far as it is possible and by compulsion where necessary. In every community there is a majority for social teamwork as against savage individualism. The great mass of Americans earnestly desire an intelligent cooperation instead of the anarchy of cutthroat competition. They want a government which truly represents the common welfare common welfa

It is true that there has not been a united public opinion. That is the reason for the bewilderment in Congress. Congresssional action has been feeble and halfway when drastic remedies were needed for the disease.

Effective action will come when public opinion crystallizes into a clear purpose out of present conflicting ideas and cross purposes. We were in the same confused condition of mind in 1916. The common mind was developed when Americans realized they were at war.

We are at war now with a greater enemy than the Imperial German Government. Once Americans realize that fact you will see them pulling together to save the old Union and establish it on greater foundations.

The Committee on Recent Social Trends with great insight de-clared that we need social inventions to balance mechanical inventions. That is the new ideal which I hope is meant by the slogan so often used by the man who will be President on which will make our economic system a better agency for the public happiness he will have no more loyal support than mine.

If President-elect Roosevelt will urge the social inventions

I will even venture to suggest the social inventions I believe would bring a more perfect union in this crisis:

1. A governor on the industrial system through an emergency stabilizing board which would license business enterprises under just regulations.

2. A pump which would draw up from the Communications.

2. A pump which would draw up from the Government reservoir of credit funds for the adequate relief of hungry American citizens.

3. A brake to prevent foreclosures on homes and farms until the establishment of fair prices makes possible the payment of such indebtedness.

4. An accelerator for purchasing power, increasing the sum of wages paid out so that consumption may be financed on an equal wages paid out so that consumption may be financed on an equal basis with production.

5. A lubricating device to assure the flow of credit only to those machines needed for the public good. Only the wheels which will help prosperity should be permitted to turn.

6. A balance for the United States Government in which only actual expenses would be considered, as a charge against taxes, omitting funds for public works, loans, investments, and public-debt retirement. These capital investments would be paid from the sale of bonds to be retired when business is restored. These are the social inventions I would recommend. They are not blue prints. They are all in existence waiting to be applied. They would end the present anarchy due to an economic system out of control.

But after all, laying down the exact specifications of the needed devices is not the most vital thing. The answers to to-day's questions are not set down as in the arithmetic books we used to study.

They must be worked out by hard work and original public thinking. Lincoln was everlastingly right. The only way to fight evil and to promote good effectively is through enlightened public opinion, clearly, freely, and continuously expressed. His efforts were to interest the American people in their own welfare and to inspire them to righteous action as the sovereign power which can control constitutions, Congress, and courts. That power, I confidently believe, will compel the installation of those social inventions which this new age demands.

If Lincoln were here to-night he would say to fear-ridden, dismayed citizens as he said to his fellow countrymen who were in the same state of mind in 1861:

"Recognize your problem and think it through. Prevent dis-union by a union of hearts and hands as you take control of the industrial machine. Keep an open mind unfettered by old prejudices and bigotries. Be bold to act in the light of shiftprejudices and bigotries. Be bold to act in the light of shifting needs. Keep faith in your fellow citizens and give them power to rule. Keep faith in your Republic as the best form of Government to advance the public good. Keep faith in the God who desires the happiness of His people, and who will help them to work out that purpose to its appointed end. Thus you may restore the Union and bring a better and more general prosperity than America has ever known. Thus you may make life in America secure, agreeable, and beautiful."

Every real American, remembering the animating ideals of that heroic savior of the Union in the sixtles, should echo the old song with which his followers greeted him: "We are coming, Father Abraham, 125,000,000 strong."

HISTORY OF GEORGE WASHINGTON'S FAREWELL ADDRESS

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address delivered by myself over the National Broadcasting Co. network February 22, 1933:

On this day, the two hundred and first anniversary of the birth of George Washington, we are reminded again of the heritage which was left to us in the greatest of all his writings, his Ferrewell Address to the American received. Farewell Address to the American people.

To-day, in a world rocking under economic disturbances that threaten our very civilization, to-day with nations in bitter and jealous contentions that seriously menace the liberties of mankind, we should turn again to that calm, noble philosophy of human relationship embodied in George Washington's immortal learner to his people. legacy to his people.

Out of the wealth of his experience and judgment, from the rich endowments of his character, George Washington laid down for the Americans of all time, precepts of government and policies that are as safe a guide to-day as when they were written 137 years ago.

Had we, as Americans, held steadfast to that address and all it means, we would have avoided many of the pitfalls into which we have fallen since George Washington quit the stage of public life at the end of his second term as President in 1797.

The vision, the patriotism, the greatness of George Washington found expression in this Farewell Address, which is beyond all question the greatest human document in our history as a Nation, next to the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution. And yet, how little do we know of that address. When it is re-next to the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution. And yet, how little do we know of that address. When it is referred to at all, it is usually misquoted, especially in regard to international relationship. But the Farewell Address lives on because it has within itself the essence of immortality.

George Washington looked far beyond his time. To him was unfolded the history of his country. He seemed to vision the trials, the temptations, the weaknesses of his people, and he tried in the only way possible to him, to lay down for us a system of precepts that would continue his influence down the vista of the years. the years.

Let us consider the background and the origin of this great document. So many misrepresentations have been made con-cerning it that it is necessary to understand the historic setting from which this masterpiece was evolved.

I am of the opinion, based upon a study of George Washington's I am of the opinion, based upon a study of George Washington's life, that he firmly contemplated retiring from the Presidency at the end of his first term, and that he did much in the preparation of his Farewell Address at that time. The first written reference to this intention can be found in Jefferson's notes. He recorded in February, 1792, that Washington spoke to him about retiring. The general grounds for this decision were that he felt unqualified, because of advancing years, to sustain the increasing public burdens that were pressing upon him, and that he longed to retire to his beloved home at Mount Vernon.

No doubt in my onlyion the last reason was the stronger.

No doubt, in my opinion, the last reason was the strongest. He always looked forward to the day when he could live in peace at his beautiful estate on the Potomac and devote his remaining years to his family, his friends, his land, and his home.

As the final months of his first term drew near, he began to plan his Farewell Address and asked Madison for assistance in drawing it up. But conditions in the country were such in 1792 that Washington felt he could not retire without violating his sense of duty. Grave problems confronted him which he felt he could not in Grave problems confronted him which he felt he could not in justice leave to a successor.

Partisan biographers of James Madison have claimed for him the credit for Washington's Farewell Address. Partisan biographers of Thomas Jefferson and Alexander Hamilton have done likewise, but such conclusions are unfair. These three men assisted, no doubt, just as other Presidents have been assisted in preparing state papers. But the George Washington Farewell Address was primarily his own. All of the contributions of his advisors were assimilated and molded into George Washington's own method of thought and literary composition. The basic ideas, the wisdom, and the flavor of the Farewell Address were distinctly George Washington's. Washington's.

Many people are of the impression that Washington delivered his Farewell Address verbally. This is not so. The historic document is dated September 16, 1796, and was first published in the Daily Advertiser, of Philadelphia, edited by David C. Claypoole. Before the year was over it was reprinted in every State of the Union. Since then several hundred editions of the Farewell Address have been printed, many of these in countries abroad. The story of the document is a fascinating one and is worthy of recountal. recountal recountal.

The original copy was presented by Washington to David Claypoole, in whose paper the document was first printed.

In 1825 the Pennsylvania Historical Society offered to purchase the document, but the proud owner refused to part with it.

In 1850 the document came on the market. Claypoole was dead, and the laws of Pennsylvania required that it be placed on auction. There was no alternative. The Philadelphia papers announced the auction for February 12, 1850.

It was at this time that certain patriotic Members of Congress wished the Government to buy the document. In the midst of wished the Government to buy the document. In the midst of the great controversy which led to the compromise of 1850, Senator Henry Clay, on January 24, 1850, introduced a general resolution authorizing the Joint Committee on the Library to purchase the document if it could be bought on "just and fair terms."

Strangely enough, this resolution stirred animosities in the Congress of considerable violence. There were two distinct schools of gress of considerable violence. There were two distinct schools of thought, based not so much, perhaps, upon the mere purchase of the document, but going deeper, and reflecting the ancient schools of divided political opinion. For there were still partisans who loved Washington devotedly, and some, we must regret to state, who did not

In making a plea in favor of his resolution Henry Clay rose to heights of oratory and patriotism. He said in part. I quote:

"What is to become of that precious document? Is it to be sold, to be perhaps transferred out of the country?

* * Who is there that would not find refreshment and delight behind the is there that would not find refreshment and delight behind the Farewell Address of Washington to the people of this country?

* * In tracing that advice to beware of sectional divisions, to beware of demagogues, to beware of the consequences of the indulgence of a spirit of disunion—who is there in reading those lines of truly paternal advice that will not in imagination transport himself back to the period when they were transmitted to paper by Washington, and think of the emotions, the paternal and patriotic emotions, of that precious moment which must have animated his breast?"

Heated debate flashed back and forth in the Senate as to the Heated debate flashed back and forth in the Senate as to the advisability of spending the peoples' money for the document and involving finally the constitutionality of such a purchase. In the fury of debate the questions of slavery and secession were injected

Daniel Webster sided with Henry Clay. Jefferson Davis objected to the purchase, saying: "I am of opinion that no benefit can result to the country or to the people generally from the owning of these sheets of manuscript. * * * It will merely gratify that feeling * * * which endears everything pertaining to the beloved or venerated dead. But are we, the representatives of the people, in making appropriations from the Treasury, to be governed by feeling, and to draw money out of the Public Treasury to gratify our sentiment? Certainly not. * * * But what is there so sacred in the manuscript of this address? It is known to have been the joint production of Washington and one, at least, of his Cabinet—not the emanation of his mind alone. I feel no such respect as has been expressed for it and can not perceive how this manuscript is to effect such happy and can not perceive how this manuscript is to effect such happy

The resolution passed the Senate and came to the House on January 29. It will be remembered that the auction was to take place on February 12. Andrew Johnson, later President, characterized the proposal as an attempt to rob the Treasury. The resolution finally passed and was signed by the President on February 12, the day the manuscript was to be sold in Philadelphia.

The sale took place before the Government, because of its delay, could even make a bid. It was sold to James Lenox, of New York, for $2,300, and for the sake of a few dollars the United York, for $2,300, and for the sake of a few dollars the United States lost the opportunity to possess one of the three greatest state papers ever written. The manuscript became part of the library of James Lenox, which later became part of the Public Library of New York City, where the manuscript remains to this day, a treasure which money can not purchase.

Washington's Farewell Address to the people of the United States can be analyzed as consisting of two main sections. The first is the definite refusal, and reasons for the refusal, to serve a third term as President, along with an acknowledgment of Washington's debt of gratitude to the country for the honors conferred upon him and the confidence with which the people had supported him.

The second and more important part of the address presented

The second and more important part of the address presented Washington's thoughts upon the Government of the United States as a legacy of advice for the future.

Orators usually credit Washington in his Farewell Address with the words, "Entanging alliances with none." That phrase does not appear in the Farewell Address. It appears in Jefferson's inaugural address of March 4, 1801.

But the thought was not new. The idea did appear in Washington's Farewell Address. What Washington said, in speaking of foreign governments was, I quote, "In extending a commercial relation to have with them as little political connection as possible." And Washington also said in this farewell, I quote, "It is our true policy to steer clear of permanent alliances with any portion of the foreign world."

In this document George Washington lays down the rules of is our true policy to steer clear of permanent alliances with any portion of the foreign world."

In this document George Washington lays down the rules of national conduct. It is the document in which political philosophy parallels the Constitution. And like the Constitution, the more the people disregard it the more they will find themselves involved in political difficulties.

In this address George Washington rises to the heights of political sagacity. He is more than the soldier, more than the statesman; he is the supreme councilor of a people with tender regard for their welfare, but essaying in every line of his utterance a firm determination that his country shall not suffer through weakness and through the temptations and blandishments of international relationship.

He is concerned only for the Americans of his day and of future days. He seems to have known the human heart better than anyone of his time or since.

If we had no other rule for our political guidance, the Farewell Address would be sufficient. And I urge all who hear my voice to-day to read this immortal document again in the light of present world conditions; in the light, also, of conditions here in our beloved homeland, that we may retrace our steps to the firm path which Washington pointed out to us.

in our beloved homeland, that we may retrace our steps to the firm path which Washington pointed out to us.

I urge that we, as Americans, may think American; that we may be American; and that we may realize that our first duty is to our country and our people. Also, that if we bring safety to our own, we are bringing hope to the world.

As Washington instituted a new system of political thought in a world of strife, of contention, and of bitterness, so to-day Washington still points the way. And as there came a new birth of freedom to the world resulting from the establishment of human liberty and democracy in the Government which George Washington helped to found, so to-day there must come a rededication to those simple, honest, and sound policies which he left us in his Farewell Address.

KEEPING FAITH WITH CUBA

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by me published in the Hearst newspapers, March of Events section:

ARTICLE BY HON. HAMILTON FISH, JR., OF NEW YORK, PRINTED IN THE HEARST NEWSPAPERS, MARCH OF EVENTS SECTION

On January 12, 1933, I introduced a concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 45) in the House of Representatives "That it is the sense of the Congress that the President of the United States exert his influence and extend to the Government and the people of the Republic of Cuba the good offices of this Government and its aid in bringing about a mutual understanding and amity among the various political factions, based on the restoration of the civil rights of the Cuban people and the establishment of a government in Cuba, adequate for the protection of the lives. government in Cuba, adequate for the protection of the lives, property, and individual liberty as guaranteed by the Platt amendment."

amendment."

Some of the New York newspapers jumped to the conclusion that I was advocating armed intervention, but such is not the case. I do not believe it necessary or advisable at the present time to send any American soldiers to Cuba. I am convinced that a firm policy adhered to by our State Department in accordance with the terms of the Platt amendment, a few forceful words from our ambassador, or, if necessary, a note from the President would be sufficient to restore the civil rights and liberties of the Cuban people.

I am prepared to substantiate the following charges against the existing Machado régime to the fullest extent by qualified witnesses before the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives or any unbiased tribunal:

1. That the Republic of Cuba has been governed during the past few years by an autocratic military dictatorship, based on terror, force, and violence.

2. That the liberties of the Cuban people guaranteed by the and all but destroyed.

3. That a large part of Cuba has been under martial law for various lengths of time, the University of Habana padlocked, and schools closed.

4. That freedom of speech, freedom of the press and of assemvention or to annexation of Cuba.

I am only interested in presenting the facts to the American people as I have found them after an investigation of several months, through the study of documents, and talks with well-informed American business men, Army officers, reporters, and public officials, as well as with Cubans of all walks of life who have been forced to flee for their lives.

I have no other purpose than the desire to place the appalling plight of the Cuban people, deprived of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, before the bar of American public opinion without fear or favor, and free from sentiment or emotion.

The contest in Cuba is as old as the contest for human rights. On one side stand justice and freedom, on the other injustice and

On one side stand justice and freedom, on the other injustice and tyranny.

The story of misrule, injustice, bloodshed, and autocratic military dictatorship in Cuba is not new.

Nor is the story of the sympathetic interest of the American people for the suffering Cubans, often in rebellion against Spanish brutalities, new in our history. In 1848 our Government made an offer to Spain to purchase Cuba for $100,000,000, but it was summarily rejected.

The long and devastating Cuban rebellion of 1868-1878 took place during the Grant administration and involved us in many

serious difficulties.

My grandfather, Hamilton Fish, in 1870, as Secretary of State, was compelled, in spite of congressional efforts to the contrary, to decline to recognize the belligerency of the insurgents on the ground that "they have no army, no courts, do not occupy a single town or hamlet, to say nothing of a seaport, carrying on a purely guerrilla warfare," etc.

However, on October 31, 1873, the Virginius, an American steamer carrying contraband, was seized by a Spanish warship and taken into Santiago. Within a week 53 of the passengers and crew, including 8 Americans, were court-martialed and executed.

Popular excitement ran high in the United States and for a time we were on the verge of war with Spain. An enormous mass meeting was held in New York City, presided over by William M. Evarts, and telegrams were read from the Vice President, Henry Wilson, Wendell Phillips, and Henry Ward Beecher urging intervention to free Cuba.

free Cuba.

After considerable negotiation, the Virginius and her survivors were delivered up to our Government and reparations paid to the families of those Americans who had been executed.

families of those Americans who had been executed.

In 1875 my grandfather, at President Grant's instigation, proposed a joint intervention of the powers in Cuba to end the barbarous civil war, which led Spain to make concessions which the Cubans accepted. From that time until the outbreak of the final Cuban rebellion in 1895 there was a period of semitranquillity. Then came American intervention.

What was it that drove the United States to war with Spain in 1898? Not the sinking of the Maine.

The real cause of war was the resentment and anger of the American people at the dreadful conditions in Cuba of slaughter, starvation, and misery. Cuba was being devastated. "It was not war," said Theodore Roosevelt, "but murderous oppression and unspeakable horror."

We entered the war to drive out the brutal military Govern-

We entered the war to drive out the brutal military Government of Spain and to free the Cubans. Under the "Teller amendment" we were pledged to help the Cubans to erect an independent nation

Our troops fought bravely around Santiago and soon bottled up the Spanish Army, which surrendered after a few hard-fought battles. In the first fight at Las Guasimas my cousin, Hamilton Fish, II, a sergeant in the Roosevelt Rough Riders, was the first American soldier to be killed in the war.

No war was ever entered upon from more humane and idealistic purposes. After we had succeeded in compelling the Spaniards to withdraw from Cuba, we turned our efforts to cleaning up to withdraw from Cuba, we turned our enerts to cleaning up the cities.

Gen. Leonard Wood, one of our greatest administrators, brought order out of chaos in a few years and, in 1902, turned the government over to the Cubans.

The Platt amendment, written by Senator Orville H. Platt, of Connecticut, was adopted by the Congress of the United States on March 2, 1901, and incorporated the same year as a part of the organic law of Cuba, and is the cornerstone upon which our Cuban policy is based.

Cuban policy is based.

It provides that the Cuban Republic should never enter into any compact with a foreign power that would impair her independence; that she would contract no excessive debt; that the acts of the United States in Cuba during and after the war be validated; that the Cuban Government should carry out certain plans for sanitation of the island; that certain lands necessary for coaling or naval stations be leased to the United States; and "that the Cuban Government consents that the United States may exercise the right to intervene for the preservation of Cuban may exercise the right to intervene for the preservation of Cuban independence and to maintain a government capable of protecting life, property, and individual liberty, and for discharging the obligations with respect to Cuba imposed by the treaty of peace on the United States, now to be assumed and undertaken by the Government of Cuba."

On the election of Thomas Estrada Palma as President, Cuba became a free and independent nation.

The administration of President Palma encountered political disturbances in 1906 when it ignored the constitutional provision regarding the independence of the judiciary and packed the courts for electoral purposes. Whereupon the Liberals, despairing of redress, started an insurrection.

President Palma made repeated appeals to our Government to President Palma made repeated appeals to our Government to intervene under the terms of the Platt amendment. Mediators were sent, but nothing was accomplished.

Finally, President Palma resigned, and President Roosevelt was compelled to proclaim a provisional government in August, 1906, and to maintain it without display of military force until an election could be held. tion could be held.

tion could be held.

This intervention, which lasted until January 29, 1909, showed that the Platt amendment was not a dead letter and that it carried certain obligations which we were bound to fulfill in order to maintain a government adequate to protect life, property, and individual liberty for the Cuban people.

Ten years later Maj. Gen. Enoch Crowder, United States Army, was sent to Cuba by President Wilson, to help straighten out the electoral laws, and a few years later he instituted a number of judicial and financial reforms under the administration of President Alfred Zayas.

Gen. Gerardo Machado was elected President of Cuba in 1924, and through political manipulation had the constitution changed to permit himself to be reelected for a 6-year term in 1928. But what is a constitution to an ambitious and determined dictator such as Machado?

However, the Cuban people who had fought for their liberties were

However, the Cuban people who had fought for their liberties were not ready to be deprived of their constitutional rights without a protest, and thus the present political struggle developed in Cuba, largely led by the intellectual and more enlightened class of Cubans, who aspired to self-government and hated tyranny.

This brings us to the present situation, under a military dictatorship headed by Machado that has ruthlessly stamped out the civil liberties of the people and substituted a government of terror, based on force and violence.

This Government oppression of the Cubans by a military autoc-cracy can not be otherwise than mortifying and humiliating to free American citizens. It becomes worse as you try to dig to the bottom of the disgraceful repression of popular Government.

bottom of the disgraceful repression of popular Government.

If Cuba were a far-distant nation and there was no Platt amendment or no obligation upon the part of the United States to maintain a government in Cuba, adequate for preserving the rights and liberties of the people, I would remain silent.

I do not deny that Cuba is an independent nation, but I submit that the United States did not go to war with Spain at the cost of American lives and expenditure of large sums of money merely to drive out a brutal Spanish military dictatorship to have it replaced by an equally despotic Cuban military dictatorship that has even closed the University of Habana, which for 200 years under Spanish rule was always kept open.

Even if there were no Platt amendment, we would have a moral

Even if there were no Platt amendment, we would have a moral obligation to use our friendly office to preserve the freedom and liberty we gave the Cuban people. But in addition there is a definite commitment under the Platt amendment which is inescapable and, as former Secretary Elihu Root said, was entered into for the benefit of the Cuban people. Either the Platt amendment means what it says or it ought to be repealed.

The Machado dictatorship runs true to form with every other dictatorship of the right or the left. It is the old story that violence begets violence and that all usurpation of the liberties of the people is built on armed force.

Having once started to extinguish the flames of liberty, a military dictatorship must progress step by step to the destruction of all accepted rights and liberties of the people, and that has been the history of the Machado régime.

There may have been originally some excuse for the use of armed force and violence against the communists and racketeers, but unfortunately it has gotten out of hand and is now being used against the students, professional and business men, and political opponents.

It was soon discovered by some officials that it was easier to liquidate political enemies by the sawed-off shotgun route than to attempt to answer political arguments or to defend the subversion of civil liberties.

The part played by some big New York banks and utility com-panies in support of the Machado dictatorship does not make pleasant reading for liberty-loving Americans. It is characteristic of the American dollar diplomacy at its worst—anything to protect property investments, regardless of human rights and the liberties of the Cuban people.

It is generally understood in Cuba that some utility companies and some other big interests seeking special favors or contracts from the Machado régime lend their important influence and contribute money for election purposes to maintain the status quo and a friendly dictatorship.

The American Government has been exceedingly patient in not remonstrating against the suppression of the liberties of the Cuban people. We have a moral, political, and treaty obligation to protest the continuation of the existing conditions, which clearly amount to repudiation of the protection of life, property, and individual liberty guaranteed by our Government to the Cuban people.

We have no right to continue any longer blind to a deplorable situation at our very doorsteps which we are pledged by congressional action to prevent.

Military censorship in Cuba is so strict that it forbids any mention of police activities, assassinations, arrest of political prisoners, or political disturbances.

Strict censorship on Cuban news makes it exceedingly difficult, not only for the American public but for the Cuban as well, to learn the truth concerning the exact situation. I estimate that 2,000 Cubans have been exiled or forced to flee from their country for political reasons and approximately the same number, or more, have been imprisoned.

The number of political assassinations, killings, and sudden disappearances is generally placed at about 1,000 persons, many of whom were young students and professional men of the highest standing.

One high police official was indicted by the supreme court at Santiago charged with having committed 44 political assassinations in 90 days but through the protection of the dictatorship was never brought to trial.

was never brought to trial.

Is there any wonder that the firebrands among the opposition have retaliated and have murdered a few of Machado's associates, including the president of the senate, Vasquez Bello, and several police officials? Where can such tactics on both sides lead but to more violence, murders, and terrorization?

The opposition, having no political rights or protection, has been forced to adopt violent methods in retaliation and has formed a forced to adopt violent methods in retaliation and has formed a secret society, called the A B C, which is bound to lead to continual bloodshed and reprisals. The lot of the Cuban people seeking restoration of their stolen liberties is tragic to contemplate.

The Habana American News of January 7, 1933, since in difficulty with the censors, reported that the young student, Antonio Alvarez Hernandez, for whom Ambassador Guggenheim interceded unofficially, was killed. In spite of Ambassador Guggenheim's unofficial plea for the boy, and assurance that he would be accorded a fair trial, he was shot to death in a reported attempt to escape under the well known ley de fuga.

The same newspaper says the too frequent application of the ley de fuga, following the application of the third degree, compared to which it is said the tortures of the Inquisition were insignificant, tends to create the impression in the minds of the public that these attempts to escape were inspired, to say the least.

that these attempts to escape were inspired to say the least.

On December 20, 1932, Juan Gonzalez Rubiera, a 17-year-old student, according to New York newspapers, was killed by the police. His body was found with 11 bullet wounds and covered with stab wounds.

The morning edition of El Pais, independent newspaper, was suppressed for carrying a picture of the body of Rubiera. The mother of young Rubiera appealed to the American embassy. "There I was told that the United States would not interfere with Cuban affairs," she said.

The Spanish Government has demanded an investigation and wasterness of the policement for the death of Mariana Government.

punishment of the policemen for the death of Mariano Gonzalez Gutierrez, a 23-year-old Spanish student, killed on January 15. Gutierrez was killed, the police say, in resisting arrest, but an inquiry by the embassy brought out the evidence that the youth was arrested, taken to secret police headquarters, and killed after three house of questioning. three hours of questioning.

The details of brutal murders, such as the killing of Gonzalo Freyre de Andrade, a member of Congress, and a distinguished lawyer who dared to defend political prisoners, and his two brothers, both professional men, in their own home, and the mutilation and murder of the two Perez boys, both young students, and the assassination of another member of Congress and eminent lawyer, Miguel Angel Aguiar, are well known to all interested in Cuban affairs.

What is not realized by the American public is that a verificable

What is not realized by the American public is that a veritable reign of terror exists in Cuba, that Habana is still under martial law, and that any critic or political opponent, be he rich or poor, intellectual, student, professional or business man or worker, is a political pawn to be exiled, imprisoned, or shot in accordance with the whim of a military régime and by the "Porra," a secret hand of spies and gupmen band of spies and gunmen.

The fratricidal war being waged in Cuba is ruinous to that county. The entire political and economic stability of Cuba is in

What a travesty on our war to free Cuba! Is it not time for the United States to offer to mediate and to insist on a restoration of the civil rights and liberties of the Cuban people?

Anything less, in view of the tragic circumstances, would not be keeping faith with our moral and treaty obligations under the Platt amendment.

RIGHT OF STATES TO BRING SUIT FOR REFUND OF TAXES ILLEGALLY COLLECTED IN 1866, 1867, 1868

Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I desire to make some observations with respect to the views expressed in the minority report on House Joint Resolution 276, reported by the Judiciary Committee of the House March 1, 1933.

The resolution provides that any State shall have the right to bring suit in the Supreme Court of the United States for the purpose of determining whether the revenue act of July 13, 1866, was constitutional when it levied and provided for the collection of taxes on certain raw materials. If the law is found to be unconstitutional, the resolution contemplates further action in the Supreme Court for the purpose of having such taxes refunded to the States for distribution. It is the contention of the proponents of the measure that the tax levied and collected was unconstitutional in that it was a direct tax in violation of Article I, section 2, of the Constitution, which provides that all direct taxes shall be apportioned among the States according to population.

The opponents of the measure object to that provision which limits the defense to the constitutionality of the law. I wish to say, in the first place, that this is the only question involved in the first action, because if the Supreme Court finds that the law is constitutional, this would obviate further proceedings. In the second place, it does not prevent the court from setting up the defense of previous payment as claimed in the minority report, because, if it is decided that any taxes should be refunded, the court is given authority in the last paragraph of the resolution to determine the "amounts of taxes collected in the respective States." If the court should find that payment had been made, it would certainly have the right to take this into consideration in fixing the amount referred to. The opinion, therefore, expressed in the minority report in this respect is quite misleading.

Another objection is that the provisions of the resolution are unreasonable, and Congress must cease this liberality in dealing with old and ancient claims. The question involved here is not one of liberality or generosity on the part of the Government or Congress; it is purely a question of law, a question involving constitutional law. The people are asking that their rights be determined by legal process. and they are not appealing to the liberality or generosity of Congress or the Government.

The reports objects further on the ground that the tax was levied on manufactured goods which resulted in the collection of more than one-half billion dollars, saying that the tax was generally added to the sale price by the manufacturer and passed on to the consumer, and it would, therefore, be impossible to refund the tax to the consumer if the taxes were refunded to the manufacturer. If the gentlemen who signed the minority report had read the hearings carefully, they would have observed that I requested the committee to eliminate by amendment "manufactured goods" from the resolution and endeavored to show that, in my opinion, where such a tax was levied and could be passed on to the consumer for payment it would not be a direct tax in violation of the Constitution. The report, therefore, is again in error as to the purpose of the resolution and misleading as to the facts upon which the conclusion was based. The question of whether the Government desires to refund a tax found to be collected in violation of the Constitution is a matter not to be decided by this resolution; that is a matter to be determined by the Congress only in case it is found that the tax was illegally collected. The primary purpose here is to determine whether it was legal or illegal. found to be illegal, then the question will arise as to whether Congress will provide for a refund of the taxes.

The minority report raises a number of questions entirely foreign to the resolution; it even inserts the testimony of the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury before the Ways and Means Committee in January, 1929, on an entirely different resolution. There they were trying to provide refunds to the individual taxpayers, and evidence was submitted showing how difficult this would be. It is admitted that it would be practically impossible to refund the taxes to the individuals who paid the taxes, but as the right of these individuals still exists, if the revenue law referred to was unconstitutional, and if the rights of the individuals have escheated to the States, as contemplated in this resolution, then the States will have the right to recover and use the funds for the benefit of every individual in such State. That is the purpose of this resolution and the hearings will show it. But the minority report goes wholly out of the record to secure evidence to support its objections, a practice not often followed or resorted to by men with as much legal ability conceded to the members of the Judiciary Committee signing the report.

The evidence shows that 45 out of the 48 States are interested in this resolution and will be entitled to refunds in case the court finds that the taxes were illegally levied and collected.

I desire to quote part of the statement I made at the hearings before the Judiciary Committee last year.

By the act of June 30, 1864 (13 Stat. 308), a tax of 2 cents per pound was imposed on raw cotton; and by the act of July 13, 1866, (14 Stat. 98), this rate was amended to read 3 cents per pound, the act providing:

"That on and after the 1st day of August, 1866, in lieu of the taxes on unmanufactured cotton, as provided in 'An act, 'approved June 30, 1864, as amended by the act of March 3, 1865, there shall be paid by the producer, owner, or holder, upon all cotton produced within the United States, and upon which no tax has been levied, paid, or collected, a tax of 3 cents per pound, ""." cents per pound,

Our contention is that this was a direct tax and therefore unconstitutional, for the reason that it was not apportioned among the several States according to population, as provided in Article I, section 2, of the Constitution.

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. Was this tax levied upon any other commodity than cotton? Mr. Hare. Yes.

Mr. Hare. Yes.
Mr. Christopherson. What other commodities?
Mr. Hare. Among other things, it was levied on sugar, if I recall correctly, tobacco, calfskins, goatskins, and so forth.
Mr. Christopherson. By the same methods, which also raise that same question in the case of sugar?
Mr. Hare. Yes. I want to make it clear at the beginning, that it is not the purpose of this resolution to confine the actions of the States to recover the tax on cotton alone but other commodities coming within the same class, provided it is held to be a direct tax as contemplated by the Constitution.
Mr. Christopherson. The reason I ask is, of course, if we pass his resolution, we would have to pass similar resolutions as to all other commodities, in fairness.
Mr. Hare. No; all other commodities are covered by this resolu-

Mr. HARE. No; all other commodities are covered by this resolu-tion. The resolution provides that any of the States may have the right to come into court to determine whether or not taxes levied and collected under the revenue act of 1866 amounted to a direct tax and therefore unconstitutional.

Mr. Christopherson. Has this proposal been before Congress on

Mr. Christopherson. Has this proposal been before Congress on any other occasion heretofore?

Mr. Hare. It has been before Congress in various ways since 1872, at more or less frequent intervals.

Mr. Christopherson. On a similar proposal as this, or has it been in the form of claims presented?

Mr. Hare. It has been, as a rule, in the form of claims.

Mr. Christopherson. And the Claims Committee, I suppose, rejected them?

jected them?

Mr. Hare. Yes.
Mr. Christopherson. Have you any information as to how much would be involved in the settlement of all these claims?
Mr. Hare. It is my understanding that approximately $200,000,000 were collected from the various States under the different revenue acts referred to. The total amount collected on cotton alone was approximately $64,679,000.
Mr. Dominick. As I understand, this bill does not refer only to cotton?

cotton?

Mr. HARE. No.

Mr. Hare. No.
Mr. Dominick. It refers to other direct taxes?
Mr. Hare. Yes; as I have just explained.
The Treasury Department has no record showing in detail the individuals from whom these direct taxes were collected. The records as to the amount collected for each State is a compilation of figures in the annual report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, showing the total amount collected from the different States for the various years. In other words, the amounts collected on the various articles are definite in that the figures are furnished by the Treasury Department.

This resolution presupposes that legislation has been enacted or will be enacted in the various States which in effect would provide that the right or interest of any individual who could not show the amount of taxes paid would escheat to the State. For instance, if a State should bring an action in the Supreme Court or a district court and the court would find that that law was unconstitutional, and then judgment should be obtained for the unconstitutional, and then judgment should be obtained for the amount collected from that State, the individual taxpayers of the State would have the right to file their claims with the State for adjudication, and if sufficient proof could be shown the claim would be recognized, approved, and paid. But in case the claim could not be substantiated by sufficient proof, the rights and interests of such individuals would escheat to the State and the State could then dispose of the funds as its legislators should see

Mr. Sparks. Mr. Hare, if I may make an inquiry at this point: It is your contention that the several States would have the right to sue for the individual taxpayers who paid those taxes?

Mr. Hare. The State would take the position that is was suing for all of the taxpayers in the State collectively.

Mr. Sparks. For the purpose of avoiding a multiplicity of suits?

Mr. Hare. That is correct. I hope to get to that point a little later. I might say that for many years this tax was thought to be constitutional, in that it was held to be a tax on personal property, stitutional, in that it was held to be a tax on personal property, the original idea being that direct taxes as contemplated in the Constitution applied only to taxes on land. This was the position taken, as I understand, when the matter was heard in 1873. However, in later years, in the case of Pollock v. The Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. (158 U. S. 601), in the opinion rendered by Chief Justice Fuller, he said:

"The Constitution does not say that no direct tax shall be laid by apportionment on any other property than land; on the contrary, it forbids all unapportioned direct taxes, and we know of no warrant for excepting personal property from the exercise of the power."

He stated further in the same opinion, in summing up his conclusion:

"We are of opinion that taxes on personal property or on the income of personal property are likewise direct taxes."

You will remember that this opinion was rendered after Congress passed the original income tax law. As already suggested, authority could be given individual claimants to bring action to recover the taxes sought to be reached, but the same thing can be accomplished under the proposed legislation and avoid a multiplicity of suits. At the same time, it will be much easier and less expensive for claimants to file their claims in their respective. States than to file them with the Federal Government.

expensive for claimants to file their claims in their respective. States than to file them with the Federal Government.

We take the position, however, that the State has a right to bring the suit, in that it has the right to protect its citizens from illegal tax assessments. I think this principle was enunciated and decided by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Hamilton et al. v. Brown et al. (161 U. S. 256).

This is not an unprecedented action on the part of Congress for similar action was taken by an act of Congress in 1912 when authority was granted individuals to bring suit to recover taxes assessed and collected under the revenue act of June 13, 1898.

The question as to whether or not the tax referred to was a direct.

The question as to whether or not the tax referred to was a direct tax or an excise tax is the crux of the whole situation, and that is the matter to be decided by the Supreme Court. My understanding of the difference between a direct tax and an excise tax is that a direct tax is one levied and imposed upon the property simply because of its ownership, whereas an excise tax would be a tax upon the earnings, income, or revenues arising out of such property.

Referring particularly to cotton, the tax was not levied on the value of the cotton at all. It was not said that there shall be 1 per cent or 2 per cent or any other per cent of the value of cotton to be paid at the time it was being processed, but it said that 1 cent, 2 cents, and even 3 cents shall be paid, per pound, on cotton in the hands of the owner, showing conclusively that the tax was to be paid by a particular person. That is, ownership was a condition precedent to the collection of this tax, and I think it can be shown that ownership in this particular case had reference to the producer, or to the grower, as we have already indicated.

Mr. Christopherson, How was this tax collected and paid? It

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. How was this tax collected and paid? It was not at the time of sale. Did they go around and check up at different times and see how much cotton each man had? How was it handled?

Mr. Hare. No; the man was required, as I understand it, to pay the tax on his cotton just as he paid the tax on his livestock, or on his land, or on any other property, except he paid the taxes on his livestock, and so forth, to his State government, whereas he paid the tax on his cotton to the Federal Government.

paid the tax on his cotton to the Federal Government.

I might illustrate my idea of the difference between a direct and an indirect tax in this way: If I were a producer or a grower of cotton and a tax, we will say, of 3 cents per pound is levied by the Federal Government, that would be a direct tax. But if I were a manufacturer of cotton and a tax of so much per pound or so much on the value of the cotton were levied, then it would be an excise tax. Or, if the law had provided for a tax of 2 per cent on the value of the cotton at the time of sale, that would probably be an excise tax, but in this case the tax was so much per pound in the hands of the producer, and therefore a direct tax.

Mr. DOMINICK, How do you draw that distinction Mr. Harr?

Mr. Dominick. How do you draw that distinction, Mr. Hare?

Mr. Dominick. How do you draw that distinction, Mr. Hare?
Mr. Hare. The distinction is that a direct tax can not be passed on to the consumer, but must be paid by the producer, whereas the excise tax is one which may be passed on to the consumer. The direct tax becomes, in this illustration, a definite and certain tax to be paid by the individual producer or grower.

Justice Brown, in the case of Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. (39 L. E. 787; 157 U. S. 491), in making a distinction between direct and indirect taxes, said:

"Direct taxes are paid by the taxpayer, both immediately and ultimately; while indirect taxes are paid immediately by the taxpayer and ultimately by some one else."

Mr. Dominick. You are not drawing a distinction, then, on the basis that the tax was so much on some certain unit or a percentage of the price? There is no difference there so far as the principle of taxation is concerned, is there?

principle of taxation is concerned, is there?

Mr. Hare. Yes; if I understand you correctly, there is a difference. If it were based upon the value of the commodity, there would be this difference: It would be variable and would come in that class of what the courts have said to be, as I understand it, an excise tax. But when it is definite, certain, and unchangeable, as was the case in this instance, it is a direct tax. It is direct on the theory that at some time or other a direct tax may be confiscatory. For instance, there have been times when cotton would not be worth 3 cents a pound, which was the amount of the tax in one of the revenue acts referred to at the outset. I have known certain grades of cotton to bring less than 3 cents per pound on certain grades of cotton to bring less than 3 cents per pound on

Mr. Sparks. In other words, a direct tax is a certain tax upon certain personal property regardless of its valuation?

Mr. Hare. Yes; that is one distinction. It is the distinction I am trying to make. But it goes farther and stipulates the person who shall pay the tax.

Mr. Dominick. Let us take a suppositious case. You would consider, for instance, a tax on gasoline of so much per gallon as a sider, for instance, a tax on gasoline of so much per gallon as a direct tax for that reason?

Mr. Hare. No; I do not think I would. If it were levied at the well, to be paid by the producer, that would be a different matter. You see, gasoline is a manufactured or a refined product. It has been processed. Whereas we are contending that direct taxes are on raw materials, unprocessed materials, in the hands of the original producer. If a tax were levied at the well at so much per barrel on the raw material before it is processed, to be paid before it leaves the hands of the producer or owner, I think that would be a direct tax.

Mr. Christopherson. In other words, the proposed tax on gasoline is a sales tax?

Ine is a sales tax?

Mr. Hare. Yes; as compared with the tax on a raw material.

Mr. Dominick. What I can not get clear in my own mind is why there should be a difference in the element of the tax, as to whether or not it is so much per unit or whether it is based upon a percentage of the value of the product.

Mr. Sparks. As I understood you a while ago, a tax upon certain personal property, regardless of its valuation, might equal the entire value of the property itself?

Mr. Hare. Yes.

Mr. HARE. Yes.

Mr. Hare. Yes.
Mr. Dominick. You could come to the same result by levying a tax at a percentage of the value of the commodity?
Mr. Hare. Of course, we are making a further distinction in this, that the tax applies directly to the producer or the grower and when you get back to naming the individual, that is in violation of that part of the Constitution which says direct taxes shall not be levied except according to population.
Mr. Dominick. I understand that; but how are we going to get by with some of the taxes that we have levied and are proposing to levy to-day?
Mr. Hare. If we are levying any taxes that would come within this interpretation of a direct tax, I think it will be unconstitutional.

Mr. Dominick. That is the thought in my mind.
Mr. Hare. I think a direct tax is still clearly unconstitutional.
Of course, it is not my purpose to argue at length or go into any great detail here as to the constitutionality of the law. That is a matter to be presented to the courts. However, I would like to make this further observation. I assume there can be no doubt but what a tax on land would be considered a direct tax and held to be unconstitutional. And, under our more modern construction or interpretation of the Constitution, there seems to be no question but what Congress has the right to levy and collect a tax on incomes arising from the sale of products of the soil, but it has not been settled whether it has the right to tax the crop or products themselves. It is our contention that a tax on farm crops, in place of a tax on the income from the sale of such crops, is a direct tax and, therefore, unconstitutional. This is particularly true of the tax in question, because at the time the law was enacted and the tax collected the grower or producer, the law was enacted and the tax collected the grower or producer, in most cases, manufactured and consumed in his own household much of the cotton produced on his own farm. Therefore, to hold that such a law was constitutional would be equivalent to saying that Congress has the right to tax an article made and consumed by the individual. Upon such an interpretation Congress would have the right to levy and collect a tax on the pork, wheat, fruits, and vegetables grown and consumed by every farmer in the country which, I am sure, would be a principle or policy of government that would shock the conscience and good judgment of every American citizen.

I might go a little farther and suggest that the law referred to is in effect a tax on land and I invite your attention to section 30 of the act of July 13, 1866, which provided:

"That in any case where goods, chattels, or effects sufficient to satisfy the taxes imposed by law upon any person liable to pay the same shall not be found by the collector or deputy collector whose duty it may be to collect the same, he is hereby authorized whose duty it may be to collect the same, he is hereby authorized to collect the same by seizure and sale of real estate; and the officer making such seizure and sale shall give notice to the person whose estate is proposed to be sold, by giving him in hand, or leaving at his last or usual place of abode, if he has any such within the collection district where said estate is situated, a notice, in writing, stating what particular estate is proposed to be sold, describing the same with reasonable certainty, and the time when and place where said officer proposes to sell the same; which time shall not be less than 20 nor more than 40 days from the time

appears from this provision that in case the collector was unable to find the cotton grown by the producer, and the tax on same had not been paid, he would have the right to seize, give notice to the grower, and sell the land on which the cotton was grown, or any other land the producer may own or have in his possession.

One objection made in a hearing similar to this a few years ago was to the effect that the taxpayer himself, if he has a claim, should have the right to bring his own actions, and not the State. Of course, they assume that the taxpayers who paid this tax are practically all dead. That is true. However, there has been no laches on the part of the people who may have had this right, because they have been coming to Congress in various ways, as I said, since 1872. I can possibly best illustrate the point I am endeavoring to make in this connection by making a personal reference. My father was a farmer who paid this tax. I can recall when he exhibited receipts for taxes he paid on his cotton. Of course, it would be impossible for me, his children, or any of his heirs to establish a claim at this time, because the receipts are lost or destroyed. Yet the claim exists, and the right to recover still exists, provided the law levying the taxes was unconstitutional, and some stroyed. Yet the claim exists, and the right to recover still exists, provided the law levying the taxes was unconstitutional, and some one should be permitted to come in and exercise that right.

Mr. Christopherson. Let me ask you a question along that line. Suppose this bill were passed and your State and other States brought their actions, judgment was recovered, and the money collected. Where would it go? I assume that many of those who paid the tax are gone. It would go to the States, would it not?

Mr. Hare. Yes. Let me follow my illustration just a little further. If this resolution were passed, and the Supreme Court should find the law unconstitutional, South Carolina could recover judgment for the amount collected from the taxpayers within the should find the law unconstitutional, South Carolina could recover judgment for the amount collected from the taxpayers within the State. Then if I and the other heirs of my father are unable to establish a bona fide claim to the amount of taxes he paid, his right, or our interest in the claim, would escheat to the State of South Carolina and the money would be distributed as the State legislature sees fit.

Mr. Sparks. If this resolution should pass, of course, the claims would have to be established under the regular laws having to do with the admissibility of evidence?

with the admissibility of evidence?

Mr. HARE. Certainly.

Mr. Christopherson. I presume the Government has a record of what moneys they collected from each State?

Mr. Hare. It has a record showing what was collected from each State, but not from each individual.

Mr. Christophenson. So that under this bill the only question that would be presented in court would be whether or not the tax as illegal?

Mr. Hare. That is right.
Mr. Christopherson. And if it were decided it was illegal, then the books of the Government would be taken as controlling in the matter of the amount involved?

Mr. Hare. Or if the courts should hold that the tax was legally levied and collected under the Constitution, that would end the entire controversy.

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. You think about $200,000,000 are involved all told?

Mr. Hare. That is my understanding.
Mr. Christopherson. Has a check been made on the books of the

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. Has a check been made on the books of the Government?

Mr. Hare. I think that information was presented in a hearing before the Ways and Means Committee a few years ago. Mr. Smith, who was an attorney representing a number of States in connection with this matter, probably has more definite information along that line, and I will ask the committee to hear him a little later. little later.

Mr. Christopherson. In what form was this matter before the Ways and Means Committee? Mr. Hare. This bill?

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. Yes.

Mr. Hare. It was similar in many respects. Mr. Christopherson. How long ago was that?

Mr. Christopherson. How long ago was that?
Mr. Hare. Three years ago.
Mr. Dominick. The bill, I believe, was introduced by Mr. Vestal, of Indiana, who died just recently?
Mr. Hare. Yes; he was very much interested in the matter, and he and I went into the case at length a few days prior to his death. I might say in the original resolution it provided that certain taxes on manufactured goods should be considered as direct taxes. I suggest that if the committee gives favorable consideration to this resolution that particular provision should be eliminated, and the preamble then will read:

"Whereas the United States under various acts of Congress

"Whereas the United States under various acts of Congress levied a direct tax against raw material and collected it from many citizens, partnerships, and corporations in various States during the fiscal years ending June 30, 1866, 1867, and 1868: * * *."

In other words, Mr. Chairman, I think it would be entirely proper to eliminate on line 2, paragraph 2, page 1, the following words:

"All kinds of manufactured goods and."

The resolution would then apply to direct taxes against raw material only.

The question of whether a State has any right to intervene or interfere in behalf of those who paid the taxes has been raised heretofore. It seems to me that the State is as much entitled to protect its citizens from illegal tax collections as it has to protect them in other matters. I think if the Federal Government, by legislation or otherwise, should by affirmative action initiate any undertaking that would have the effect of endangering the health of the citizens of a State, the State would certainly have the right to intervene. Or if the Federal Government should by some great engineering project seriously interfere with the water supply of a large number of citizens the State would have the right to intervene and protect the rights of its citizens. Therefore, if the law levying a tax on raw cotton or unmanufactured cotton or other commodity was illegal and unconstitutional, it was a trespass upon the rights of the citizens of the State and there seems to be no doubt but what the State would again have the right to interfere in behalf of the interests of such citizens.

To illustrate further: Suppose this Congress, in its effort to balance the Budget, should pass a law requiring the owners of all real estate to pay a tax of 50 cents per acre. There can be no doubt but what this would be considered a direct tax in violation of the Constitution, and the State by appropriate action would have the right to intercede in behalf of its citizens.

Then, as we have said, if, by a corresponding act, Congress should levy a tax on the product of an individual produced in its raw state, it is considered a direct tax, and the State would also have the right to intervene, my contention being that if the law under which the taxes were levied and collected is unconstitutional the funds actually would be held in trust by the United States and the Government would be a trustee for the taxpayer. Then, if the right of the taxpayer has escheated to the State, the funds would be held in trust for the States, and any State should then have the right to bring suit and recover. On the other hand, if the right of the individuals who paid the tax should not escheat to the State until the law is found to be unconstitutional and it is impossible for the Government to completely carry out its trust to such individuals then, under a well-established principle of law known as the doctrine of Cypres, the trust should be carried out as near as possible, in which case the State would be the logical agency to institute proceedings, for the trust funds under these conditions would certainly be held in trust for the State.

To repeat: If the law under which the taxes were collected is unconstitutional, the funds would be held in trust by the Federal Government for the taxpayer. Then, if the taxpayer can not be found and the taxes can not be returned to the proper person, the State, having the right to protect the interest of its citizens, would certainly have the right to intervene and act in their behalf. In other words, if the Federal Government has money collected from individuals it is not entitled to under the Constitution and the individuals can not be found or their claims supported by their legal representatives, there can be no doubt but what the State should have the right to assert its interest and substitute same for that of its citizens. The State, under such circumstances, would assume the same position in behalf of its citizens with respect to their rights against the Federal Government as the Federal Government would take with respect to their rights against a foreign government.

DEFLATION OR INFLATION

Mr. AMLIE. Mr. Speaker, for the immediate present, I feel that 90 per cent of the real issue is as to whether the new administration proposes to lead us out of the economic crisis in which we find ourselves by means of a deflationary course, carried to its logical conclusion, or whether we shall do an about-face and embark upon a policy of inflation.

Because of this feeling on my part, I make to the Seventythird Congress my "Ave Cæsar, morituri te salutant."

While the situation has been markedly changed by financial developments that have taken place during inaugural week, I feel that an analysis of the basic economic problem has been very well stated in the introductory paragraph in a discussion of this subject to be found in the Chase Economic Bulletin, of the Chase National Bank, for June 12, 1931. It reads as follows:

Public opinion regarding economic matters is badly confused to-day through the conflict of two opposing sets of ideas regarding the causes of the depression and the remedies for it. One school of thought, to which I adhere, finds the difficulty in a disturbance in economic equilibrium, and would expect things to right themselves again and business to go on actively and satisfactory when balance is once more restored. The other school of thought finds the causes of the depression in deficiencies of purchasing power, and would seek to find the remedies by artificial increases of purchasing power in one way or another.

While I do not agree with the conclusion reached by the author, I very fully agree with him in the analysis that he has made, namely, that under capitalism it is possible to work our way out of the economic crisis in which we find ourselves by proceeding in one of two possible directions, and that the confusion of thinking on this subject on the part of people is due to the fact that they have no conception of the basic economic situation. In the consideration of this problem it would be well if we could keep the following picture in mind:

Total national wealth, 1929, $365,000,000,000.

Equities: Total indebtedness public and private, $203,000,000,000, owned by bondholders, mortgagees, and banks who have no direct voice in management.

In 1929 the total wealth of the United States was approximately $365,000,000,000. We had a total national indebtedness at that time, public and private, of $203,000,000,000 made up substantially, as follows:

Corporations	$76,000,000,000
Urban mortgages	37, 000, 000, 000
Bank loans	35, 000, 000, 000
Government:
State, county, local	21, 000, 000, 000
National	18, 000, 000, 000
Farm mortgages	9,000,000,000
Miscellaneous	7, 000, 000, 000

With this picture of the United States in the heyday of its prosperity it will be well to remember the following: The thing that makes a capitalist economic society move is the expectation on the part of the business man that he will be able to earn a profit. It is characteristic of the business man that he is at all times willing to take a chance on losing dollars where at the best he could only expect to make nickels or dimes should his venture succeed. It is this very optimism and tendency to be a bull in the market at all times that gives to our capitalist system its vitality and also its charm, during boom periods.

The classical school of economic thought is in the main built around the central figure of the business man, the entrepreneur, with the law of supply and demand guiding the use of the instruments with which he works—land, labor, and capital.

But in discussing the activities of the business man as depicted by the swing of the business cycle, it is well to remember that this cycle operates only within the field of equities. That is to say, the business cycle moves in the main between the top line of $365,000,000,000 and the top line of business indebtedness in the sum of $203,000,000,000. It must be kept in mind that the $203,000,000,000 represents money owed to investors who merely have a first lien on the country and its productive machinery to the extent indicated. They take no part in the management of business. This function is left to the business man, who operates primarily in the field of equities.

But during a period of great contraction the position of the business man becomes extremely uncomfortable. The line of indebtedness remains fixed, while the line of gross values moves rapidly down under the general force of economic contraction.

Since the present depression began, it would perhaps be altogether safe to say that the top line representing the total wealth of the Nation has been moving down at a rate of about $40,000,000,000 a year. At the present time the total wealth of the country is probably very close to the line of total debt. The field within which the business man moves has become greatly restricted. In fact with the equities which can be readily translated into credit almost wiped out, the business man has become greatly restricted. He can not move. This is of vital significance when we bear in mind that the business man is the nerve center of the profit system.

Before we can have an upturn in business conditions it is necessary that conditions be made as favorable for the earning of profits as possible, and second that the position of the business man be made such that he will be able to take advantage of these opportunities. That is to say that the business man be given room in which to work between the line of total gross value and the line representing fixed obligations or debt.

This can be done in one of two ways. In the first place by letting deflation run its course until all the factors that enter into production reach a point of equilibrium somewhere near the bottom. This means not only reducing wages and commodity prices but also reducing the fixed load of capitalization. This involves the necessity of writing down fixed obligations until they are in line with the reductions that have taken place in the field of wages and commodity prices.

This is necessarily the painful part of the process in so far as the possessors of capital are concerned. It involves the reorganization of companies and a scaling down of the burden of debt either through bankruptcy or through adjustments between debtors and creditors. It involves moving down the line of national debt now in the neighborhood of $200,000,000,000, until it has been moved down far enough to give to the business man an equity over and above this line of debt.

Instead of recognizing that this is a logical, inevitable, and a necessary part of the process of deflation, the owners of this great body of indebtedness have rushed to the Federal Government and secured the creation of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in order to save themselves. In other words, they favor deflation at the expense of wages and commodity prices, and hope to escape the consequences of a deflationary policy in so far as they themselves are concerned. They are unable to see that this hope is not only impossible but utterly fatuous in that it merely delays the day of reckoning and adds further consequences to the price which they must pay.

On the other hand, is the policy which might be termed one of business expansion or inflation. The proponents of this plan also realize that before there can be a business recovery room must be made for the business man within the system. This, however, they hope to accomplish by expanding business and credit and thereby raising the line of total values to a point where the business man and his margin of equities will be protected.

To achieve this end the proponents of this policy would favor having the Government do that which must be done in order to maintain purchasing power and charging the cost back to the possessors of wealth and income, principally by a policy of increased inheritance and income taxes as a continuous governmental policy. Such a plan would depend primarily upon an extensive public-works program as a means of keeping the unemployed at work.

But a great deal of water has gone over the dam.

(a) During the first two years of the depression I believe that the situation might have been saved and the status quo maintained had we embarked upon a public-works program large enough to create artificially the purchasing power needed to consume the normal products of industry.

(b) During the next year I believe that much could have been accomplished had we embarked upon a large publicworks program, but obviously it would have required an expenditure of at least twice as much as would have been needed during the first two years. Ultimately we perhaps should have been forced to resort to currency inflation, but only after the Government had been made the beneficiary of the fruits of an extensive public-works program. Much misery and loss of human values could also have been avoided—a consideration which should have been of first importance in a civilized country, but is wholly ignored by banker government.

(c) We have now entered upon the third stage of the deflation, where there is no alternative but to resort to currency inflation, with all of its attendant evils.

In connection with the lost opportunities of the first two years of depression, it may not be amiss to hold a short postmortem. It will be remembered that Mr. H. C. Hoover, in the Mining Magazine, London, in May, 1912, justified as economically sound the exploitation of investors by promoters, on the theory that it was better for the promoters to use the money for capital expansion rather than to leave the money to be used by the investors for the purchase of consumption goods. (Speech of Senator Blaine, Congressional Record, 72d Cong., 1st sess., vol. 75, pt. 8, pp. 9127–9129.) In this article Mr. Hoover epitomized the viewpoint of the classical economists, that is, the apologists for capitalistic exploitation.

But, as a result of his war and public services, Candidate Hoover in 1928 seemed to have had a change of heart. He stood squarely on the duty of the Government to provide employment to the workingman if industry failed or was unable to do so. Viewed from the standpoint of campaign promises and pledges in 1928, it is doubtful if we have ever elected to the Presidency of the Nation a man who has given voice to more enlightened political idealism.

After his election in the fall of 1928 he translated some of these observations into more specific recommendations. At the governors' convention held in New Orleans Governor Brewster of Maine, in the name of President elect Hoover and at his request, presented the so-called "Hoover Plan," calling for a $3,000,000,000 bond issue to pay for public works to give employment to the jobless during periods of depression. In view of these facts, it would be wholly fair to say that Mr. Hoover was elected President standing squarely on the purchasing-power theory of economics, and in line therewith advocated a public-works program and similar devices as a means of handling periods of depression. Earlier in his political career Mr. Hoover had said:

There is no economic failure so terrible in its import as that of a country possessing a surplus of every necessity of life in which numbers willing and anxious to work are deprived of these necessities. It simply can not be if our moral and economic system is to survive.

When the depression came there is no question but that Mr. Hoover sought to maintain wages, and could he have secured the support of the financial oligarchy which controls the United States, that he would have embarked upon a large public-works program, but, unfortunately, the Republican Party was beholden to this group. It has been related by Mr. Frey, of the American Federation of Labor, that when a great New York publishing house tried to support Mr. Hoover in his policy of maintaining wages, one large bank brought pressure upon this publishing house and compelled them to change their policy and advocate an economy or deflationary program.

This is a brief summary of the tragedy of Herbert Hoover, concerning which some historian in the future will no doubt give adequate treatment.

When President Roosevelt opened his campaign for the Democratic nomination by a radio speech last spring, he dismissed the idea of a public-works program as a cure and intimated that he considered its proponents guilty of shallow thinking. His inaugural address indicates that he favors a large public-works program as a means of giving employment. Such are the exigencies of politics.

THE CENTRAL PROBLEM

It has been the basic tenet of my political philosophy that our economic system is approaching the end of an epoch. Moreover, I believe that the present collapse of the economic order was inevitable, for the reason that American industry and enterprise has been built to a plan which calls for constantly widening horizons in which to expand. Unfortunately, however, for the system, there are natural limitations along this line. Since the disappearance of our frontier about 35 years ago, our economic system has been enabled to operate as the result of a set of largely fortuitous circumstances and also as a result of artificially created purchasing power over and above the purchasing power derived from wages, rent, interest, and profits. This fact is well illustrated by the $25,000,000,000 of additional purchasing power created as a result of our participation in the World War, and also as a further result of the sale of foreign securities to American investors, which may aggregate $15,000,000,000. Since the disappearance of the frontier, therefore, it seems to me that our economic system has been enabled to operate only through the creation of $3,000,000,000 a year or more of artificially created purchasing power, or, in lieu thereof, on an expansion of credit based upon paper. The trouble, however, with this plan comes in the fact that the situation must be rectified through periodical confiscation through deflation. As capitalism becomes more advanced the swing of the business cycle becomes constantly greater and greater, and the misery engendered by the process tends to reach the breaking point.

It is not only my belief that we should have resorted to a large public-works program in the fall of 1929 but that we have reached a point in our economic development wherein the system can be made to operate only by large expenditures for public works year by year as a permanent policy. We must prevent oversaving, overinvestment, and overexpansion of productive capacity by taxing away such portions of our income with heavy income and inheritance taxes. It is either a matter of doing this or having this wealth destroyed by the swing of the business cycle.

In the advocacy of a public-works program I want to make it clear that I do not believe that such public works should be in the nature of self-liquidating projects, but quite the contrary. Such public works should be for roads, public buildings, recreation centers, parks, and the like, which would yield only a social income.

It seems to me that a continuous public-works program policy is the only means by which our economic order can be stabilized. This statement is not based upon hard and fast logic, but rather upon an observation of the workings of our economic system.

I can see a great many reasons why this tends to be true, but I confess that I am not able to state to my own satisfaction why our economic system must necessarily work in the way that it does. Basically, I believe the reason has been stated by economists such as Hobson, Marx, Proudhom, and de Sismondi. Clearly, labor can not buy back more of the products it has created than its wages will permit, nor can the profit taker consume more than his capacity will permit.

The conversion of the surplus into some form usable by the profit taker is the grand problem. As long as we had unexploited natural resources the answer was simple. Since that time he has hoped to convert this surplus into more capital goods. During periods of depression this becomes temporarily difficult. It seems to me, however, that there are other reasons at this time which are not clearly understood. Of late years it seems to me that the problem is further complicated by the fact that we are securing added efficiency in our productive machinery, not so much through the construction of new capital goods, but through the redesigning of existing capital equipment.

This problem, however, is the nub of the economic question. We shall probably know more about it as time goes on, unless, of course, events render the whole question irrelevant.

BANK MORATORIUM FORTUNATE

It is indeed fortunate that the break in our credit structure should have come before March 4. It would have been a great calamity had Roosevelt taken office and then embarked on a program designed to save the general credit situation and, incidentally, about $43,000,000,000 of deposits in our banks. The break would have come anyway and his program, whatever it might have been, would have received the blame for the closing of all the banks, which by that time had become inevitable. In other words, had he proceeded with a large public-works program to give employment it would have been on the assumption that the people of the country had $43,000,000,000 in bank deposits, a part of which would be available for the financing of such a program, when in fact such deposits had already been reduced to almost half by the forces of economic contraction.

As it is, President Roosevelt takes over the reins on March 4, but he will find out of his 4-horse team one horse is already quite dead, while a second horse, still on its feet, has a decided glassy stare in both eyes. The whole country knows that President Roosevelt will not drive a 4-horse team, but only a 2-horse team, with a third horse in such condition that it is doubtful whether it can be carried along. We are therefore prepared to confine our efforts at this time to the realization of more moderate hopes than would have been the case had the banking structure of the country been able to stay on its feet.

At the opening of the Seventy-second Congress, in December, 1931, I stated to my colleagues from the mid-West that the credit structure could not stand the strain of running the deflationary process to its logical conclusion. Since the middle of 1932 all casually informed people have known that the man with a thousand dollars in the bank did not in fact have a thousand dollars in the bank. He had it only if he got his thousand out first. If he were to take potluck with the other depositors he would get nearer $500. Whereupon the grand question became: "When will the big boys go rugged individualist?'"

To one watching the proceeding from the outer darkness it became evident about the middle of February, 1933, that the movement was well under way. About that time I stated to some of my midwestern colleagues that by March 4 all banks in the country would be closed.

I have mentioned these incidents because I know Congress well enough to expect a flood of moronic statements to the effect that the banks had to close because publicity given to Reconstruction Finance Corporation loans weakened public confidence; failure to balance the Federal Budget (even though the budget of almost every individual in the land was unbalanced); failure to enact the sales tax; failure to lower the income and inheritance taxes; failure to eliminate Government departments and compensation to war veterans; failure to raise the tariffs by adjustments for depreciated foreign currencies, and so forth.

When the facts became known about the bank with-drawals that are now taking place, it will be found that it is not the small depositors but the big ones, close to the seat of power, who are withdrawing their deposits. Moreover, it will be found that some of our big men high in the affairs of state not only got theirs in gold but that they transferred this gold beyond the jurisdiction of the United States Government. This despite the fact that they are the ones who have the greatest stake in things as they are; but such is rugged individualism.

CLASSICAL DEFLATION IS SUICIDE

As stated heretofore, the tendency is for the business cycle to widen its swing as our capitalist economic system becomes more advanced. In the depression of 1921 general business activity dropped about 27 per cent below normal. At the present time general business activity has dropped approximately twice as far. The misery that has been engendered by the process has never been equaled in the United States. The 15,000,000 or so of the unemployed who are at the bottom of the social structure have been taking the brunt of the punishment. They have taken it with incredible fortitude. Even yet there is but small indication of any intention on their part to revolt. This is largely true because they are the people who are at the bottom of the social structure and they are singularly helpless.

But it seems to me that there is grave danger at this time that the ruling classes of the United States may presume upon this docility altogether too far. It seems to me that if American history teaches anything it is that the American people are not a docile, peaceful type, but on the other hand are given to extremes of violence. There is no valid reason for believing that the people at the bottom of the social structure are any different from the traditional historical American citizen. Moreover, the distress is fast spreading into a group from which leadership might well be expected to come.

Had we permitted our capital structure to crash in the very beginning, our chances of working out of this depression by means of a deflationary policy would have been greatly enhanced. As matters now stand, we have had three and a half years of acute depression. We have gone a long way toward ultimate deflation, but through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and other devices we have delayed the deflation of the credit structure. We are just beginning on that in real earnest at this time. The process may be greatly speeded, but it seems to me that it would still be a matter of a year or two before the writing down of the capital structure could be concluded. Whether people could stand another year or two of acute depression is a grave problem. Certainly no enlightened government would deliberately subject its citizens to such unnecessary punishment, and certainly intelligent and free men would not submit to it.

But assuming that the lid could be kept on while the process of deflation runs its natural course, the prospect for improved business thereafter does not seem particularly reassuring. The completion of the deflationary policy contemplates the bankruptcy of every individual who is so unfortunate as to owe money. This is fully recognized by the banker economists. In his testimony before the Senate Finance Committee February 22, Mr. Aldrich, president of the Chase National Bank, said:

An honest man can go bankrupt and retain his reputation. * * * Such a bankrupt can come back again and receive credit again in the future.

These gentlemen are already at work trying to sugar coat the bitter pill. But, as a matter of fact, we all know that this is not true. The great majority of business men who are forced to go through bankruptcy have their morale completely broken. A nation of bankrupt business men is not a particularly prepossessing group upon which to rebuild a broken economic structure. At the best these men will only be low-salaried clerks in the future. Confidence in business leadership will have been pretty effectually destroyed.

But, granted that we can complete the process of deflation, cancel our war debts and most of our private foreign obligations, and then arrange for the extension of further public credit in certain places, we may start the economic machine running under its own power but with reduced living standards for the masses and a permanently unemployable group.

LAISSEZ FAIRE OFFERS NOTHING BUT DEAD SEA FRUIT

But it seems to me the question is not so much whether we shall be able to reach our objective as it is what we shall have attained when we get there; that is to say, does it offer any hope of permanent improvement and a better life for the great masses of the people? It seems to me that no one who has any knowledge of our present economic situation could hold out any permanent hope.

The best proof of that is simply to analyze the corrective forces within the structure of laissez faire to determine whether they are only temporarily out of order or whether they have permanently ceased to function.

Let us examine the main self-corrective forces upon which the adherents of a doctrine of static equilibrium depend to correct certain maladjustments within the economic structure.

In the first place, if we have a period of unemployment the classico-banker economist urges us not to worry for the reason that this situation will tend to correct itself. If men earning $5 a day lose their jobs, they may later be reemployed at $3 a day. At this latter figure the employer can manufacture and sell goods profitably even in a depressed market. Soon the unemployed will all be able to secure work at the lower figure. Employment will become general and soon a scarcity of labor will bring wages up again to the old level.

But in this depression the list of the unemployed grows from day to day, and after three and a half years employment seems more remote than ever.

In the second place, these same economists have been assuring us that the merchants' shelves would soon be depleted, that goods thereupon would have a scarcity value, and industry would get back to normal. But we have found in this depression that we have an almost unlimited capacity to produce goods more and more cheaply than ever before. Moreover, goods produced for immediate consumption tend to be a smaller and smaller part of the whole volume of goods produced. Durable goods and consumption goods consumed over a period of time have become a very large part of the whole output, and this depression has demonstrated our ability to get along without these goods almost indefinitely, and in the meantime we seem to be heading back to a more primitive form of economic life.

When the attention of the classical economist (banker group) is called to the relatively small part of the social product that goes to labor and the large part that goes to capital and profit it causes him but small concern. After all, if a rich man spends his income in riotous living it serves to keep the economic system operating just as well as though the same money were spent by a working man for necessities. And if the wealthy man does not consume his income, but seeks to invest it, the result is the same, anyway.

If he spends it for capital goods, it goes to labor in the process. If he puts it in the bank, it will be borrowed by some one who wishes to use it in business. Here supply and demand will regulate the process. If there is great demand for the money, then things are booming, interest rates are high, and there is nothing to worry about. If there is small demand for money, then interest will come down—theoretically to zero—until business men will find it profitable to borrow and make use of this available capital at low interest rates.

This is a beautiful theory. The only trouble with it is that it does not work out in that manner. There seems to be a fixed reluctance on the part of people to accept less than a standard rate of interest, even though the interest rate charged makes the business cycle inevitable. In this depression, with commodity prices steadily falling, the business man with good collateral has realized that he would be a fool to borrow money for business purposes while the banker has realized that he would be even a criminal if he loaned money on anything but adequate collateral. As a result the cycle of depression widens and the securities in which the banker necessarily invests his depositors' money depreciate in value until the "rugged individualists" decide that they had better get their money in gold while the getting is good.

So here we are. And what has happened to the perfect self-adjusting mechanisms of our monetary system built around the gold standard? The answer is nothing, except that the whole business has become irrelevant.

In the same way the banker-economist to-day views his concept of economics as in a state of static equilibrium. He sees the economic machinery operating at a general average speed. If it operates too fast, there are factors within the system that will tend to slow it down. If, on the other hand, it operates below normal, then there are other forces that will tend to speed it up. What goes up must come down, and what goes down must come up. The pendulum of the business cycle swings.

In 1921 it swung 27 per cent below normal. Now it has swung about twice that far below normal. Theoretically it may swing to zero, and given a long enough time, it will swing back again. But unfortunately for the classical theorist in this matter, time is of the essence. Nor can the pendulum swing below 50 per cent for long without causing an explosion that will render the whole philosophy of laissez faire utterly irrelevant.

So dense is the classical economist that, in England where depression has been a steady diet since the war, he is now learnedly discussing depression cycles. It is as though an old man had become bedridden with a number of chronic diseases. In his youth good health was the normal, but in his present condition a good bowel movement may set one day out as a red-letter day.

The philosophy of the classical economists is like any other system of philosophy. It may be compared with the scholasticism of the middle ages. If certain postulates be presumed, then every part fits with every other part, which of course it must, being a philosophic system. It is this feature that misleads its adherents. And adherents are notoriously slow in detecting the breaking down of postulates which quite incidentally renders the whole superstructure irrelevant.

Laissez faire is like an old man with a number of vital organs that have ceased to function. Blood transfusions may prolong his life, but unless there be hope of ultimate recovery, what is the use?

CURRENCY INFLATION NOT A PANACEA

When the human mind begins to lose its grip on reality and seek escape, there are three general avenues open. The man who has felt manual labor to have been his great burden usually seeks salvation for the earth in the field of perpetual motion. The man who has found life, with all of its burdens, unbearable, usually turns to the hereafter and concentrates his attention upon a short cut that shall be a sure road to God. Just at this time every Member of Congress is fully aware that the half-educated man, perplexed by a bewildering economic system, seeks to find the cure in some rearrangement in the monetary system. He first mistakes the symbol for the thing itself, completely ignores mass psychology, and finds the solution in the printing press.

But while I believe the foregoing to be a correct analysis of most of the printed matter that comes through the mail, I recognize that the situation has now gone through a fundamental change. I have always held that the difficulties in which we find ourselves are economic rather than monetary.

I still believe this.

I believe that if we are ever going to achieve economic stability it must be accomplished by means of having the state confiscate wealth and income above a fixed point as a fixed policy and convert such wealth into capital assets designed to produce social income only.

CURRENCY INFLATION NOW THE LESSER OF TWO EVILS

But despite what I have said about currency inflation and what I have always felt to be true about the merits of currency inflation as against an inflation of credit secured through a large public-works program, I now believe that we have come to a time where currency inflation is the lesser of two evils.

The classical argument made against currency inflation is the fact that this is a means of wiping out the savings of our middle-class people, whether the same be in bank deposits, bonds, mortgages, or life insurance. This is hardly true at the present time. If we were to devaluate the dollar by a third or even more, we would not be wiping out the savings of our middle-class people, for the reason that on the basis of our present gold dollar half of these savings have been wiped out anyway. We should only be recognizing that which to-day is an obvious fact, even to the casual observer.

A mere recognition at this time of the facts as they are might serve to avert the necessity of wholesale bankruptcy for everyone so unfortunate as to owe money. This would tend to help rather than hurt the creditor, for the interest of the bondholder is always best served by not having a change in management. Forced and general reorganization at this time would force values down to unprecedented low levels. In fact, there is good reason to believe that creditors generally would do much better by accepting pay in a devaluated dollar than by taking their chances with wholesale reorganization.

But it is argued that we can not devaluate the dollar because of the fact that we have about $75,000,000,000 in long-term obligations made specifically payable in gold.

There was some force to this argument when there remained the hope that we might stay on our recent gold-standard basis. To-day we might as well recognize that wherever we have a debt payable in gold, for the payment of which property has been hypothecated, that property belongs to the creditor. The equity of the nominal owner has now been wiped out. He has nothing further to lose by devaluation of the dollar and there is the possibility that the gold-clause creditor may be deprived of his 23.22 grains of gold through the imposition by the Government of a compensatory tax on payments made in such dollars.

The constitutional objection, however, is essentially obsolete. What good is a gold clause if the farmers or home owners refuse to permit the law to take its course?

The same question applies to the obligation of governmental units.

If it can be made high treason to be possessed of the yellow metal, there should be no difficulty in preventing Shylock from taking his pound of flesh. But immediately the argument is made that the Government can not dishonor its own obligations. I realize the force of this argument. Moreover, I realize that we will not devaluate the gold dollar to compensate for the actual losses already sustained. Devaluation will come ultimately, but only after the dollar has depreciated as a result of the issuance of a large amount of paper money, presumably redeemable if and when we have redemption in gold.

At the present time we have a very influential and able school of economists who argue that it is possible to go on a managed currency basis and, through the control of the amount of paper issued and the rediscount rate, to maintain the value of such money at any desired level.

At least it must be said for this group of economists that they have been able to foresee the present debacle. What they do overlook, however, is that the controls in the United States will be essentially political, whether left in the hands of Congress or in the hands of the Chief Executive.

If we enter upon such a policy of paper inflation, it will be for the purpose of financing a big public-works program, to relieve unemployment and distress and other equally laudable purposes.

The amount of currency that must of necessity be issued if commodity prices are to be raised will have to be extremely large. When the break in value comes it will not be gradual but very sudden. Where the cutting of the gold content of the dollar at this time by one-third might make adequate readjustments in values for the purpose of saving our credit structure, it will perhaps be safe to say that when this process has run its course the value of the dollar will more likely be equal to 23.2% grains of pure gold to the dollar. This statement is based upon what happened in Belgium, Italy, and France, where the dollar was finally stabilized at about 20 per cent of the original value. After the value of money has dropped substantially, it is possible that this lowered currency value will be stabilized and that when devaluation comes it will be merely a legal recognition of what is already an existing and workable fact.

The result obtained in these European countries could be very quickly achieved in the United States if we were to follow the advice of the bankers, who are now endowing the telegraph companies, telling the Members of Congress that they ought to set up a 100 per cent guaranty of all bank deposits.

This would probably double the burden of debt already carried by the Government of the United States. It would greatly reduce the value of Government bonds and the devaluation of the dollar would very quickly become a reality. But, despite what we may feel ought to be done in this matter, we must recognize that this process must go through a definite and well-recognized evolutionary process.

While this picture is not a pleasant one, it nevertheless presents what to my mind is the choice of the lesser of two necessary evils. As stated heretofore, it is futile to attempt to follow out a policy of laissez faire (deflation) to its logical conclusion—in the first place, because the probabilities are that classical deflation under present conditions would probably mean suicide. But, assuming that deflation could run its course, it would have nothing to offer except precisely what we are going through at the present time.

INFLATION OFFERS HOPE OF AN ULTIMATE GOAL

At the best, the advantages of inflation appear only as positive advantages when compared with the purely negative advantages offered by deflation. As stated heretofore, it is purely a choice between evils. We can go in only one of two directions. There is no compromise possible, except, of course, if we should become embroiled in a world war, which, unfortunately, becomes increasingly possible.

If we proceed along an inflationary course, it will first have this positive justification, that the Nation will be meeting its responsibility to its unemployed. This is an obligation that can no longer be deferred, whether viewed from the standpoint of social justice or actual survival. The administration of such relief through currency inflation will inevitably be tied up with what will at least in part be a planned national economy.

The effects of inflation will admittedly weaken the position of our middle class, but their position now is untenable anyway. For three and a half years our so-called middle class has watched with mingled horror and satisfaction the plight of those unfortunates who are at the bottom of our social structure. From now on we may look for some hope from this same middle class, for the reason that their interest and security will be dependent upon the success of a planned national economy. They ought to realize now that they can have no security in a system which compels those less fortunate to bear the brunt of these periodic readjustments through the cycle of inflation and deflation.

When the inflationary process shall have been completed it seems certain that the power of oligarchic wealth will have become greatly weakened. At this point it seems probable that the support of the middle classes will be thrown behind the maintenance of adequate wages for the working people and also for the Government ownership of all utilities, upon a capitalization that will not exploit the public.

Moreover, if the thralldom of great wealth over our middle classes could be broken, it seems probable that we might also embark upon a policy of taxation designed to make available to all men on equal terms the natural resources of the country and also to prevent those abuses which led to the present breakdown of our economic structure.

If the corporation has in fact become the state, then we must recognize the fact that the corporation must be controlled by the people. The breakdown which we are now witnessing is not comparable with any of the past periods of depression that we have gone through. If we must think in terms of analogies, it would be better to compare it with that period in European history when the feudal system was disintegrating and in the process of being replaced by capitalism. What we are witnessing to-day is nothing more or less than the disintegration of a social and economic system. The change will be brought about in an orderly way by those in a position of control, who have been trained for leadership, or else the change is going to come about as the result of the operation of forces inherent within the bottom of our social and economic structure.

HOUSE RESOLUTION 99

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen of the House, on January 17, 1928, I offered a resolution (H. Res. 99) requesting an investigation of the prohibition administrator for the Maryland-District of Columbia area. The resolution was based on the following charges:

First. The prohibition administrator promoted Agent Robert H. Beall, who had been indicted by the grand jury of the State of Maryland for assaulting and beating two women.

Second. He had employed one Harry C. Wimbley, who had been convicted of the crime of robbery and sentenced to six years to the Maryland penitentiary. The said Wimbley also had pending against him an indictment for an assault with attempt to kill and an indictment for carrying a concealed weapon.

Third. That one Joseph R. Brewer, prohibition agent, was permitted to continue in the service while an indictment was pending against him for the murder of one Charles V. Gundlach, a 73-year-old farmer of Maryland.

On February 21, 1928, I called the attention of the Members of the House to the fact that the prohibition administrator for the Maryland-District of Columbia area, had succeeded in persuading the United States district attorney, Amos W. W. Woodcock, now the prohibition administrator, to have Judge William C. Coleman "gag" the owners and editors of the Baltimore newspapers. After Brewer was acquitted on the plea of self-defense, Colonel Woodcock, who had defended him, instructed the prohibition administrator to call a conference of the agents and caution them regarding the use of their firearms, using the following words:

Their job is an unpopular one, and they can not be too careful. There are few cases where shooting is necessary, and in view of the hostility toward their work they should be watched.

On March 26, 1928, I took the floor on a question of personal privilege because of an attack made upon me by G. W.

Crabbe, the superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League for the district of Maryland, who endeavored to defend the action of Joseph R. Brewer.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to call the attention of the Members of the House to the remarks made on Friday, February 24, 1933, by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Blan-TON] with intent to humiliate me because years ago in my younger days, long before the prohibition amendment, I worked for a time as a bartender. This same gentleman from Texas, who has boasted many times on the floor of the House that he is a defender of the Constitution and the laws of the country, and that he is strictly a 100 per cent lawabiding Congressman, stated, when I yielded to him on March 28, 1928, "I never defend a guilty man. I defend the innocent." Notwithstanding the fact that he never defended a criminal and always defended the innocent, the gentleman from Texas has never made any inquiry to ascertain whether or not the facts were true as stated in my Resolution No. 99, introduced in the Seventieth Congress. On the contrary, every time I have taken the floor he has attempted to embarrass me and defend, without investigation, the agents and all of the allies of the Anti-Saloon League

I want to say, Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, that the charges made by me in my resolution have been proven against the various agents without any further action on my part. For instance:

Robert H. Beall has since been dismissed from the service. Harry C. Wimbley, the man who had been sentenced to the Maryland Penitentiary for six years prior to his appointment as an under-cover man, by reason of the cloak of respectability placed upon him by the Government as a prohibition agent and the defensive gestures made in his behalf by the gentleman from Texas, was able to persuade and deceive a widow into marrying him. Then this same Harry C. Wimbley took that widow and her child out in a canoe in the waters of Virginia and drowned them in order to obtain insurance. He is now, I am informed, serving a life sentence for the crime.

Joseph R. Brewer, who was charged with the murder of the 73-year-old farmer, was also defended by the gentleman from Texas, notwithstanding the fact that he had been a bootlegger, and the evidence shows that he was in the habit of receiving graft. This man is now being investigated by the United States district attorney for the district of Maryland in Baltimore for conniving with the so-called king of the bootleggers of southern Maryland.

Truly as nasty a collection of malefactors as could be gathered together, yet when, in connection with the appropriation bill, I proposed amendments legislating against the employment of criminals, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Blanton] constantly opposed the amendments and constantly attacked me with his efforts to humiliate me because long years ago I was a bartender.

Time, and the courts, have proven that I was right when I first made my charges, in January 1928, and that same time and those same courts have proven that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Blanton], who says he never defended a guilty person, has been defending murderers simply because they hold positions under the protecting influence of that association he always champions, the Anti-Saloon League of America.

POSTAL SERVICE AND SEVENTY-SECOND CONGRESS

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, never since the Postal Service was established under the Constitution in 1789 has there been a record of decreased revenues such as has marked the past three years.

In 1930 postal revenues were $705,484,000. In 1931 they dropped to $656,463,000, which was a loss of $49,021,000.

In 1932 the revenues dropped to $588,171,000, a loss of $68,292,000 from the previous year. This was a loss in two years of $117,313,000.

To understand what this means it is important to view the trend of postal revenue from 1921 to 1930. During that period there was an average yearly increase of $26,880,000.

If that rate of increase had kept up during 1931 and 1932, the revenue for 1932 would have been $759,244,000.

The expenditures for all postal expenses in 1932 were $740.418.000.

If normal business had prevailed, last year would have shown a surplus of almost $19,000,000.

The deficit of 1932 of $152,246,000 was due to the loss of revenues caused by the business depression.

However, Congress faced the actual deficit and undertook to deal with it in the Seventy-second Congress.

It is interesting to note that the action taken did not permanently impair two fundamental policies of the United States Postal Service.

These two policies are (1) low postage rates increase volume of mail and reduce the unit cost of handling, (2) postal workers shall have just and fair compensation schedules on a permanent basis.

While Congress dealt with both postage rates and postal wages, it very wisely did not touch the permanent schedules of either postage rates or postal pay.

First-class letter postage was increased from 2 to 3 cents, not as a postal action but as a temporary tax, expiring by self-limitation.

Postal wages were reduced 8\% per cent, not as a cut in compensation schedules but as a temporary furlough which reduced working days to correspond with the pay reduction.

In other words, during a period of unprecedented drop in revenues, Congress maintained the permanent policies which have made the United States Postal Service one of the modern wonders of the world for efficient, safe, and certain communication. Unmistakably, Congress has stated that any changes made are emergency measures which are to be endured only for a temporary period.

That even such roundabout action was a mistake must be apparent to any student of postal affairs.

The sooner both postage rates and postal wages are restored, the better it will be for the Postal Service.

THE 3-CENT RATE

Under the emergency tax bill of 1931, a levy of 50 per cent was laid upon first-class postage, increasing the long-established 2-cent rate to 3 cents. It was estimated by the Post Office Department that this increase would yield about $130,-000,000 additional revenues, based on 1931 returns.

As a matter of fact, the figures for 1933 will show a reduction in revenues due to this increase amounting to at least $50,000,000.

In 1932 there were approximately 13,000,000,000 pieces of first-class mail matter. At the rate of decrease in operation thus far there will be about 8,000,000,000 pieces for 1933. This means a loss of 5,000,000,000 pieces, or decreased revenues of $100,000,000.

The revenues from all first-class mail in 1932 amounted to $310,325,000. This was 9 per cent less than in 1931. If the same reduction had occurred for 1933, due to the depression, the revenues would have been $292,000,000.

However, figuring 8,000,000,000 pieces of first-class mail matter, which includes 1-cent postal cards as well as 3-cent letters, at the full rate of 3 cents each, the revenue would be $240,000,000. This would indicate a loss of $52,000,000 due to the effect of the high postage rate.

Just as important as this actual loss is the fact that mail users have taken vast quantities of first-class mail matter out of the mails entirely and have established their own private-delivery systems. Department stores, public-utility companies, and others distribute their statements, notices, and so forth, by using their drivers and other employees. Every city in the land now has examples of this enforced private competition with Uncle Sam's mail. The longer the high rate continues, the more difficult it will be to restore the mail matter to postal channels even at the lower rate.

Then, too, mail users have diverted a great quantity of first-class mail matter, which is profitable, into third class, which is a losing classification.

Millions of Christmas greeting cards went through the mails last December at the 1½-cent rate, instead of the 2-cent rate which has formerly prevailed. Business concerns, which formerly sent letters in sealed envelopes at 2 cents, now send the same matter at the 1-cent bulk third-class rate. The use of the 1-cent postal card has greatly increased, and, according to the cost ascertainment of the Post Office Department, every one entails a direct loss in handling.

Mr. Speaker, it was a serious mistake to increase the letter-postage rate. It has not provided the revenues expected. It laid a burden upon business in a time of distress, and business has naturally refused to shoulder that added burden. It will take years to recover from the effect of this unwise action. There should not be any delay in restoring the 2-cent rate under which the Postal Service flourished in good times and bad for almost 50 years.

THE 8 1-3 PER CENT REDUCTION

While the so-called furlough plan was a far fairer method of reducing postal pay than a flat reduction without corresponding reduction in hours, it remains true that it has not helped to meet the postal problem nor the American problem.

At the very time when every encouragement should be given American business by increased and more efficient service, this enforced month's lay-off for every postal worker meant curtailment of service.

The proper action in a depression period was stated by Pastmaster General Bissell, who headed the Post Office Department during the depression of 1893. Here is what he said:

When adverse business conditions prevail, an ordinary business establishment may overcome them in part by economies of management and retrenchment of expenditures. Not so the post office. It can not and should not stop to consider little economies. Its duties and obligations to the public become at once intensified and enlarged. It must exert itself to the utmost to secure the best possible results in the way of celerity, accuracy, and security in the dispatch of mails and without sparing any reasonable expense in that behalf.

Mr. Speaker, instead of curtailment of service, there should be increased service in a time of business discouragement. There should be greater speed in getting mail to the adressee instead of less speed. There should be more collections and deliveries instead of fewer. Every postal worker should be utilized in the greatest degree as a unit in a mighty agency of service to the American public and American business.

If the furlough cuts the postal expense account some $40,000,000, there will be no gain if the resulting curtailment in service takes an equal amount of revenues out of postal funds.

There is but one answer to the postal problems of to-day. It is greater volume of mail. The postal service can take on mail matter producing $100,000,000 in additional revenues without added expense.

In 1921 the gross deficit was eighty-five millions including the cost of free services and nonpostal activities. In 1926, although an increase in postal wages had been put into effect, the gross postal deficit was nineteen millions.

The increase in volume and the increased efficiency of postal workers made this result possible. Every year under normal conditions the personnel took on great additional volumes of mail without a proportionate increase of cost.

Measured by revenues the postal workers of 1930 produced more than twice as much as the workers of 1913. Yet there was no complaint as to the amount of work accomplished in 1913. The difference was in the volume of mail matter and the increased efficiency which accompanied it.

Charles F. Trotter, superintendent of post-office service, said in 1929:

Eight years ago, on July 1, 1921, there were 66,789 employees in first and second class post offices, including clerks, supervisory employees, but not including letter carriers or motor-vehicle service employees. That was one employee for every $6,050 of postal receipts. On the same date in 1928 there were 78,133 employees, or one for every $7,930 of postal receipts. In other words, in 1928 each employee, through greater industry and increased efficiency, and there can be no other explanation of it, was turning out 31 per cent more work than in 1921.

Let me state it another way. If the output per capita had been the same in 1928 as it was in 1921, then in 1928 instead of having 78,133 employees we would have needed 102,354, or 24,221 more than were actually used to carry on the work. That means we made a saving of 24,221 employees on account of increased efficiency. That great saving can not be ascribed to the introduction of labor-saving devices introduced into the service in those seven years. The credit belongs to the men and women of the service. service.

Mr. Speaker, the postal deficit can be eliminated through normal postal business. Steps in that direction will be restoration of the 2-cent postage rate and immediate replacement of the service which has been discontinued during the past two years.

Of course, this action alone will not restore the volume of mail carried in 1930. The Postal Service is engulfed in a nation-wide depression, which has affected every business and every individual.

We have attempted to deal with this depression through wage reductions and retrenchments. This meant reduced purchasing power and more unemployment. Thousands of idle factories, tens of thousands of closed banks and bankrupted businesses, hundred of thousands of foreclosed homes and farms and millions of suffering families testify to the tragic folly of such a policy.

If it is continued, it simply means final collapse with the palance set at zero on both sides.

Restoration is possible, but it must come through stabilized industry, shorter working hours, and increasing living standards. The only cure for the unemployment which blights the Nation is jobs for willing workers. In providing work opportunities, the United States Government should lead the way.

The yardstick by which every legislative proposal should be measured is the question, Will it put people back to work and increase their purchasing power?

With able and willing workers, now unemployed, back on their jobs, the volume of mail will be restored to normal and the postal deficit will be eliminated.

POST-OFFICE LEGISLATION

Mr. Speaker, while the Post Office Committee of the House did not favor either the 3-cent postage or the reduction in postal pay, it did propose legislation for Postal Service better-

Under the terms of a House resolution the committee made a comprehensive survey of the entire service. Its conclusions form a most constructive report, which, if carried out by Congress, will mean a more efficient service. The following table gives the history of the measures favorably acted upon by the committee during the Seventy-second Congress:

No. of bill	Title	Reported in House	Passed House	Reported in Senate	Passed Senate	Signed
	To authorize the Postmaster General to investigate the conditions of the lease of the post-office garage in Boston, Mass., and to readjust the terms thereof.	July 14, 1932	Feb. 7, 1933, amended. (Con- ference report agreed to by both Houses Feb. 24, 1933.)		July 1, 1932	Mar. 1, 1933

THE AIR MAIL SERVICE

During the past Congress the air mail service has been under fire, owing largely to the undue development of this new branch of the service.

The $20,000,000 appropriation for 1933 was cut to $19,-000,000 for 1934 by the House. The Senate eliminated the entire appropriation. In conference the amount was fixed at $15.000.000.

The Post Office Committee made a thorough inquiry into air mail, and its report is a valuable contribution. Its recommendations will eliminate all subsidy for air mail within five years.

The United States air mail service has been a vital factor in building the aviation industry in the United States. Since the enactment of the original air mail act of 1925, a nationwide network of air mail lines has been established. The quantity of air mail has steadily increased. A market has been furnished for planes and equipment, and a large number of pilots have been given an opportunity for training. However, the cost of these devolpments through subsidy payments has been increasing and has gone further than was originally intended. This service can and should be put on a self-sustaining basis. The committee has not deemed it wise to deal with the relative military advantages of the various air mail routes.

The first air mail act provided for payments not to exceed four-fifths of the revenues to the air mail operators. This was later changed to a rate of $3 per pound, which was the estimated four-fifths return under the original provision. Through the operations of this system the quantity of air mail carried determined the payments made.

The Watres-McNary amendment to the air mail act, which was passed in 1930, provided for the space-mileage system of payment to contractors. As a result, contracts were entered into by the Post Office Department which stipulated fixed payments for passenger-carrying flights without relation to the actual mail carried. The appropriations for domestic air mail service which were $4,150,000 in the fiscal year 1928 have grown to $19,460,000 for the fiscal year 1933.

A complete change in the method of payments to contractors must be made in the interests of justice and economy. Whatever justification there may be for a large subsidy as a means of establishing the new aviation industry, it is time now to look forward to the cessation of such payments and the establishment of the air mail service on a selfsustaining basis. This should not be done suddenly or drastically, but constructive action can be taken which will guarantee the desired results.

There should first be established a basic rate of payment based on the pounds of mail carried and the number of miles flown. This rate should be within the revenues now received on lines carrying substantial amounts of mail. A number of air mail lines now being operated could be successfully and profitably carried on at a pound-mileage rate which would not exceed the revenues received.

Some of the present desirable lines could not exist upon ing the largest volume of mail. Therefore there should be established two classes of air mail contracts for the present: (a) Those which will provide a basic rate per pound mile which will keep payments within the revenues received, (b) those which will provide in addition to this basic rate a subsidy-mile payment for a period not to exceed five years, at the expiration of which time the basic rate will alone be

At present contracts are awarded on a space-mileage basis at varying rates. The lines carrying mail in large volumes utilize the space contracted for, while other lines fill only an insignificant part of the space for which payment is made. A survey of the traffic volume on the extensions made since the passage of the Watres-McNary amendment shows that none of these utilizes more than 15 per cent of the authorized space, and one-the New York-Atlantic City route-utilizes only 1.6 per cent of the space authorized and

It should also be provided that independent operators who do not now have air mail contracts might apply to carry air mail, and upon approval of the route by the Post Office Department the basic pound-mile rate would be paid. All routes now in operation and any to be established in the future should be required to develop a reasonable poundage of air mail within a reasonable time or the contract should be canceled.

It is believed that there are certain pioneer operators, who have never had an air mail contract who would be glad to take advantage of a flat pound-mile payment and thus to supplement their present revenues as well as to provide a real postal facility. For instance, there has never been awarded an air mail contract in Hawaii. The Inter-Island Airways Co. has been rendering an efficient passenger and express service for several years. It operates out of Honolulu and has a six days a week service eastward and also a service to the westward. It is equipped with twin-motored amphibian planes and carries two pilots and 2-way radiophones. There is a terminus on every island.

It has been estimated that there would be available more than 2,000,000 air mail letters a year. This volume is due to the fact that the airplane furnishes the only possible speedy transportation, as daily steamer schedules are prohibitive in cost.

Under the recommended plan, the pioneer air-transportation company would carry air mail at the flat per pound rate, without any subsidy payment. The service rendered would be a valuable one, and yet its cost would not exceed the revenues received from postage.

The per mile subsidy payment to be made to the second class of air mail operators should be adjusted by a negotiation between the contractors and the Post Office Department upon the cost-balancing principle. In other words, full consideration should be given to the proper consideration of actual and true costs of operation and a proper consideration of revenue received from other sources. Through the field audit elsewhere recommended and the control of the a uniform rate which would be adequate to the lines carry- | accounts of the companies by the departments, this subsidy should be reduced year by year in the proportion that expense per unit of mail service is reduced and revenue from other sources increased.

Various attempts have been made by the department to set up formulas for payment to contractors. They are neither correct in theory nor practical in application. The only formula applicable is the principle of payment for actual service rendered and for such subsidy payment as may be justifiable for the purpose of establishing an air mail service at a cost which will not permanently exceed the revenues from the mail carried.

The most important result to be obtained from the structure of rates suggested would be the establishment of a self-sustaining air mail service as the goal and the elimination at a stated time of all subsidy payments. It has been suggested that further to encourage commercial aviation and advance the art of flying, a premium be paid to those carriers who improve their service with faster and more efficient airplanes of larger carrying capacity, greater passenger comfort, longer cruising range, better instruments, and further adaptation of radio. The committee favors such advancement of the flying art.

It should be provided that those holders of route certificates under the present law who desire to do so may exchange such route certificates for an indefinite certificate entitling them to carry air mail over their present routes at the basic pound-mile rate. Those contractors who find themselves unable to do this should be permitted to exchange their present route certificates for one not to extend beyond five years and calling for the payment of the basic pound-mile rate plus a per mile payment agreed upon by the contractor and the department, not to exceed 25 cents a mile.

There are certain extensions which have been made which are economically unjustifiable as a postal operation. If these extensions are required to develop a reasonable volume of air mail in order to warrant their continuance, the problem as concerns them will be solved. All the lines which are justifiable as a postal facility will be able to prove their right to exist by the expansion made during the five years through which they may receive subsidy per mile payments.

Air mail postage rate should be fixed at 5 cents for each half ounce or fraction thereof. This rate, estimating 32 letters to the pound, would produce $1.60 per pound of mail carried.

The recent increase from 5 cents to 8 cents has resulted in a decrease of air mail dispatch and reduced volume of mail. The often-proved principle in postal operations, that low rates produce increased volume and thus lower unit costs, operates in the air mail system. The restoration of the rate to 5 cents would encourage the use of the air mail and in the end produce greater revenues.

There should be a new air mail facility, a postal card, for air mail exclusively. It should be of standard design, furnished by the Government at 2 cents each. These should be of pasteboard and should weigh at least 150 to the pound, which would mean revenues of $3 per pound. It is our belief that many patrons of the Postal Service would gladly avail themselves of this opportunity to send a written message in the speediest manner possible at such an insignificant cost. At the same time it would mean added revenues and a method of helping to make the service self-sustaining.

The adoption of the recommendations made by the Post Office Committee will furnish the permanent solution of the air mail problem, which has been a vexing one. The various experiments made up to this date have brought a great deal of experience which should help point the way to constructive action. There have been vigorous criticism of administrative action and many attacks upon the amount of the subsidy paid to air mail contractors. The action suggested will take away much of the arbitrary power hitherto reposed in the Post Office Department and lay down the basic rules which must be followed. It will reduce the subsidy steadily and set a definite date when all such payments shall cease.

Within five years an adequate and comprehensive air mail service can be established and the payment for its operations will come entirely from the revenues received from postage. The Post Office Department will then be engaged in its natural activity, expediting the carriage of air mail, Through the operation of this postal facility commercial aviation will be developed and extended and the United States kept in first place in air mail activities.

ECONOMY IN GOVERNMENT

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, about 100 years ago Chief Justice Marshall called attention to the fact that the power to tax was a power to destroy. To-day we are loaded with a burden of taxes which demonstrates the truth of the famous statement, and the problems presented are among the most serious and critical which we confront.

Ten years ago $1 of the national income, on the average, out of every $15 was required to support all our agencies of government—city, county, State, and Federal. Now, one dollar out of every three is called for by the tax collectors. In other words, every time you earn a dollar you are required, directly or indirectly, to lay 33 cents aside to give to a taxgatherer.

So the problems are serious and, in my judgment, of major importance. The income of men and women must be relieved of a substantial part of this charge, or the final step in socializing all work, property, and income must result. For, obviously, whether earnings of people are completely taken by taxation or confiscated by law is merely the difference between methods. The result is the same—full absorption of all men and women in public service, abandonment of individually owned property, and the extinction of a person's right to dispose of the proceeds of his labor as he sees fit.

The direct answer to the problem of high taxes is simple, and, simply expressed, is "economy in Government"; but its ramifications are manyfold and complex, and the statement of the answer by no means solves the problem, as so many people in public office glibly shout. Certainly the way to reduce taxes is by reducing expenditures, but the saying of this does not accomplish it. If it did, the Democratic promise to reduce the cost of Government by 25 per cent would have borne fruit in tangible accomplishment in our present Democratic House of Representatives long before this.

The fact of the matter is that the string of governmental expenditures has become so tangled and knotted through our recent prosperity years that there is little chance of unraveling the skein without cutting here and there, discarding the pieces spoiled in the process, and splicing the remainder into a whole that will be less extensive, smaller in size, and through which the cord will run without snarls or obstructive strictures.

The perplexing part of this problem is its far-flung ramifications. Many an elective public officeholder has a pet governmental activity, which in his opinion must be preserved above all others. Every knot or snarl in the Government skein has been put there in the past by some one with a desire to extend a service to the public or to provide a panacea for public ailments. The sponsor of the tangle is sure that his handicraft can not be discarded without endangering the city, State, or Nation, as the case may be.

Then we have the people who believe in economy if it affects the other fellow, but not if it is brought home to themselves. The kind who resist to the last ditch the closing of wastefully duplicated navy yards or army posts, or Federal courts or the consolidation of several adjacent governmental services like, for example, the two complete flying services located on the same flying field in Washington. The entire overhead expense of one of these services could be saved by consolidation, and would be if operated by any private-business enterprise in the world, but will not be so long as there are enough public-office holders to prevent it who are more interested in protecting the personnel of such services than in protecting the taxpayer's pocketbooks. I was one of a few who voted for this economy last year, but it failed to carry by a considerable majority.

For the purposes of "economy in government," and to lay down a tentative formula by which a large share of the taxpayer's burden may be removed, a broad and general classification of governmental activities applying alike to city, county, State, and Nation may be undertaken somewhat after this fashion:

First: Luxury functions, represented by the money paid out for the maintenance of activities which, while probably desirable from a social standpoint, are not indispensable—a thing we like but can discard without harm.

For example, taxes for the support of municipal bands and public playgrounds. Fine, I say, when we can afford them, but wholly unnecessary when the taxpayer's dollar, to pay for such services, comes laden with mortgage foreclosures, undernourishment of children, and back-breaking loads imposed on men and women generally. These taxes should be struck off in a spirit of sorrowful necessity and should be returned if and when our income makes it possible.

It is not my purpose to point out a multiplicity of luxury activities which come in the class of desirable but not indispensable. There are many, and the public, which pays the bill, now realizes it. The whole question is to bring ourselves and our expenditures for governmental purposes within our resources and to utilize those resources where the necessity is paramount. The first and least harmful step is to abolish these luxury activities. Single them out, I say, cut them off, and no one will really suffer from their discon-

Next after this luxury class comes the class of governmental activities which, while necessary, are so swollen and overextended that they need a reducing fare to bring them down to their proper size. For example, take our present organizations in government to look after agriculture. There are many overlapping and wasteful duplications. We have the State department of agriculture, the Federal Department of Agriculture, the agricultural college at Ames, and similar State schools in other States, the Federal Farm Board, county agricultural agents in most, if not all, counties, county agricultural fairs and livestock shows, State agricultural fairs and livestock shows, and so on and so on to an almost endless extent.

Now, no one will say that from this bureau expansion some saving by amputation is not possible without destroying the essentials. And in passing it might be asked whether or not our present deplorable condition of agriculture is not in part the result of so much "help" from governmental activities. I do not know, but I do know that a lot of tax money goes to this giant agricultural, governmental octopus which could be saved by intelligent pruning and coordination. But will it be done, when every time it is proposedeven before the knife is unsheathed—an agonizing yell emanates from what is to be lopped off and the sympathy and help of a sponsor thereupon becomes active?

I want to be sure that I am not misunderstood about this proposal. What I have in mind specifically is this: When the Federal department and a State department are duplicating work, one or the other should stop. What is the sense of using taxpayers' dollars to pay for identically the same work in both departments? You would not run your own business that way. If you had two departments, both of which were doing substantially the same business, you would consolidate them if you could; but if for some legitimate reason you could not, then you would coordinate their functions so that one would not be rethreshing the straw of the other

Inasmuch as the State agricultural activities in all their various phases and ramifications may be dealt with promptly it would probably be better to study this subject from the standpoint of changes in the State organizations to fit the Federal department, thereby reducing directly State and county taxation and effecting a much larger saving to the taxpayers.

I have used the agricultural set-up. State and national, to illustrate this last proposal. It is used solely as a typical example to convey the plan which is not limited to the wasteful duplication of agricultural activities. There are other State and national duplications where integration of activities may also be undertaken.

It should also be pointed out that there are the same possibilities of wasteful duplications among the various State, county, and city activities as there are between the State and Federal activities, and the wholly intrastate field of possible economies should not be disregarded.

Third in the classification of things to do to obtain economy in government probably should come the effort to make more governmental functions or services self-sustaining instead of a drain upon the taxpayer. I have in mind, for example, the regulation of public utilities, the inspection of restaurants, barber shops, and so forth, the policing of private property like fairs, theaters, and so forth, Why should the taxpayer be charged to pay for special services to private interests? Why should such special services be furnished by the city, county, State, or Federal Governments to private interests without cost to them. Let a proper and adequate fee be charged for all special services to private interests and remove the taxes that are now collected on that account.

If this whole field were carefully canvassed and an adequate schedule of fees were applied, I venture the assertion that a substantial saving in taxpayers' money would ensue.

We can now go into the various departments of government themselves and survey them for a reduction of essential service, wherever overmanned or extended, and abolishment of nonessential service wherever found. This latter might properly be placed under my first classification of luxury functions. What I have in mind is cutting out the cost of such maintaining at taxpayers' expense. We can do readily without paying for that sort of thing. There are an infinite number of nonessential services in all departments of government, both State and national, which could be abolished without harming the public service. The effective way to go about this is to set up a nonpartisan committee with power to act, or delegate the job to the Executive. Give the members of such committee, or the Executive, both the power and responsibility and time enough to make a proper investigation into each situation and the job will be done. But until such power and responsibility are concentrated the job is hopeless, as I have said before.

In addition to nonessential services in government, we also have many overmanned and time-wasting departments. These must be dealt with by a careful study of conditions and service in each department; and when the facts are obtained, the remedy should be applied without fear or favor.

I could continue indefinitely to point out the possibilities of governmental economy, but time will not permit. The difficulty with handling the whole proposition on a businesslike basis is the relatively small number of our people who are militantly insisting that it be done. Every citizen should, for selfish reasons if for no other, take an active part in urging a reduction of Government costs, resulting in a smaller burden of taxes. The louder the demand from the public, the greater will be the result. The Democratic Party is now in power-in fact, has been in absolute power in the House of Representatives for the past two years-and for the next two years the Democratic majority in both the House and Senate will be overwhelming. We have a Democratic President, elected upon a specific issue of economy and a specific promise to reduce expenditures at least 25 per cent. There is no question about this promise; it was made over and over again during the campaign in all parts of the country.

Now, my last word is, hold these people to their promises; do not be misled by the juggling of figures; watch your tax payments, and if they do not reflect at least a 25 per cent reduction within a reasonable time-if you can not see an improvement in economic conditions, bringing more nearly in harmony governmental expense and national incomethen. I say, put yourselves down as having been beguiled into making a change in political parties in power without doing yourselves any good; and the next step is to organize and put into office under definite commitments men who will be fearless in redeeming their promises regardless of where the ax falls, so long as our essential governmental services are retained.

HON. JOHN E. WEEKS

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, the first congressional district of Vermont was represented during the Seventy-second Congress by Hon. JOHN E. WEEKS, one of the most painstaking, substantial, and conscientious representatives who ever occupied a seat in the House. He was not a candidate for the Seventy-third Congress, choosing to return to private

As a public servant Governor Weeks holds a unique record covering a period of nearly half a century. He was elected to the Vermont House 45 years ago and served with distinction. He was promoted to the State Senate in due time, and was later returned to the House for two terms, during one of which he was its speaker. His fairness and efficiency as a presiding officer won for him the confidence of the members of both parties.

From 1902 to 1906 he served on the bench as associate judge. In 1906 he was made chairman of the penal board; in 1917 director of State institutions; and in 1923 commissioner of public welfare. In 1926 he was elected governor of the State for a term of two years. In 1928 he was reelected, being the first governor of the State to be reelected in 71 years. During his term as governor, he dealt with the problems of reconstruction after the disastrous flood of 1927 in a statesmanlike manner and led the State out of a serious financial condition. In 1930 he was elected a Member of the Congress. He was also a trustee of Middlebury College from which institution he holds degrees of M. A. and LL. D. He also has been honored by LL. D. degrees from Norwich University and from the University of Vermont.

Not once in all of the period of his public service did he lose the confidence and respect of the people of his State. He has rendered a full measure of service to his constituents here in Washington. In most instances it takes years to master the details of congressional work, but out of his ripe experience Governor Weeks was able, from the beginning, to perform the duties efficiently.

In charitable deeds, in his helpfulness in welfare work to bring usefulness, joy, and happiness to the homes of others, Governor Weeks has laid up for himself "treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt." He is a splendid type of Christian gentleman.

In all of his work he has had the benefit of the help of a fine wife who has been his companion and a real helpmate for more than 50 years.

All in all, by experience, character, and ability John E. WEEKS has been one of the best Representatives the people of Vermont ever sent to Congress. He has always given his best to the Nation and the State he so deeply loves. His retirement leaves me with a feeling of real personal loss.

WILIAM H. SEWARD

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following address delivered by me at Florida, Orange County, N. Y., September 24, 1930:

Mr. Chairman and fellow citizens, it is with a mixture of trepidation and gratitude that I have come here to help dedicate this monument to the memory of William H. Seward at his birthplace, given by his friends and admirers. I am fearful that I will not do justice to this occasion and to the high character and distinguished public career of Orange County's foremost son during the nineteenth century. I am grateful for the kindness and consideration of the committee in inviting me here to pay tribute and do honor to William H. Seward, an illustrious American statesman, in his home town and among the valleys and hills and the form lands which have charged so little since he was can statesman, in his home town and among the valleys and hills and the farm lands which have changed so little since he was born, on the 16th of May, 1801, in the village of Florida, N. Y.

The village itself has changed considerably, for it only contained a dozen houses at the opening of the nineteenth century. However, many of the descendants of the settlers prior to the Revolutionary War are still living in this vicinity, and are attending these ceremonies, such as members of the Roe, Wheeler, DeKay, Demarest, Sayre, Sanford, Burt, Welling, Armstrong, Wisner, Ketcham, Seely, Decker, Conklin, Bradner, Carr, and Van Duzer families

In the brief time allotted to me, I would not be able to touch upon more than a few of the outstanding achievements in the brilliant career of Lincoln's Secretary of State, whose renown and achievements are a glorious part of American history. For this reason, I shall stress his early manhood and his associations with Orange County, famous before his day for having given to the Republic both Gov. George Clinton, who served his country with ardent patriotism as governor of New York State during the Revolutionary War, and acted as chief executive in our State for a total of 18 years, and his nephew, DeWitt Clinton, who as governor built the Eric Canal, which resulted in opening up the trade of the Middle West and brought prosperity to New York, making it the chief port of the Nation.

Both Gov. George Clinton and DeWitt Clinton were born in the town of New Windsor, which has been a part of Orange County since 1801, but prior to that belonged to Ulster County. Both counties, therefore, have a right to share the honor of being the birthplace of the Clintons, but to Orange County alone goes the undisputed honor of giving that great champion of human rights, William H. Seward, to the American people.

His father, Dr. Samuel S. Seward, was the leading citizen in his community, being also a successful farmer, magistrate, store-keeper, and banker. At one time he served in the State legislature and in politics was a Jeffersonian Democrat. This is interesting, in view of the fact that his distinguished son later foresook the party of Jefferson and became an ardent Whig and was In the brief time allotted to me, I would not be able to touch lature and in politics was a Jeffersonian Democrat. This is interesting, in view of the fact that his distinguished son later fore-sook the party of Jefferson and became an ardent Whig and was the first Whig governor to be elected in New York State. Doctor Seward lived to an advanced age, dying in 1849, after his son's election to the United States Senate.

The Seward family moved shortly after the Revolutionary War from Sussex County, just across the line in New Jersey, to the village of Florida in the town of Warwick. The grandfather of the governor was the colonel of the First Sussey Regiment during the governor was the colonel of the First Sussex Regiment during the Revolutionary War.

In origin the family was a mixture of English and Welsh, with some strains of Scotch-Irish. Doctor Seward had six children, of whom William Henry was the fourth, and because his physique was less powerful than that of his brothers he was early selected to receive a college education, which was the practice in those days among families that could not afford to give equal education

The boyhood of William Henry Seward was that of any farmer's son at that period, and as a matter of fact the same routine holds son at that period, and as a matter of fact the same routine holds good to-day. He got up at dawn, drove the cows to pasture, cut wood, and did the daily chores. In his father's household, which was not unusual at that time among well-to-do farmers, there were three negro slaves. It is probable that the bitter, unrelenting, uncompromising attitude that Governor Seward showed early in his political career and consistently maintained against slavery had its origin in the trying experience of the slaves in his father's household and among those he knew in the vicinity. Even in the North the slaves had few rights and little protection from abuse and mistreatment. Slavery would, anyhow, have been repugnant and offensive to William H. Seward, who believed fundamentally in human rights and hated injustice. It is interesting to note that he provided for the old family slaves and to the end of their days they were his pensioners; such was the generous and noble character of this native son of Orange County.

He was educated in the village school in Florida and at the character of this native son of Orange County.

He was educated in the village school in Florida and at the academy at Goshen. He was a bright and studious boy, particularly inclined to the classics, and such was his application to his studies that he qualified at the age of 15 to enter the junior class at Union College, Schenectady, but owing to the rules as to age was compelled to start as a sophomore. Union College a century ago was one of the largest colleges in the country, and Doctor Nott, the president, was recognized as a great educator. Young Seward applied himself seriously to acquiring knowledge at college and eventually won the much-sought-after Phi Beta Kappa reward for excellent scholarship. Before the completion of his course he left college over a dispute about lack of funds from his father to enable him to pay his tailor's bill, and manifested his independence by him to pay his tailor's bill, and manifested his independence by sailing for Savannah, Ga., and obtained a position as a teacher near there in a newly established academy. His father was furious, but he refused to return until the appointment and arrival of his SUCCESSOT.

On his return home he entered the law office of John Duer at Goshen and spent six months studying law. He then joined the senior class at Union and graduated with honors in 1820. On leaving college he went to New York and entered the law office of John Anthon, well known for his legal talents in the first quarter of the nineteenth century. Seward remained there for about a year, and then returned to Goshen and went into partnership with Ogden Hoffman, a lawyer who had recently moved there and who later made a splendid reputation at the bar and was elected attorney general of New York State. He remained in the firm of Hoffman & Seward until the autumn of 1822, when he was ready to pass the examination for the supreme court bar and to seek his own fortunes in his chosen profession.

He passed his legal examinations at Utica in October, 1822, and took up his residence at Auburn, N. Y., where he began to practice law in the office of Judge Miller, whose daughter, Frances, he shortly afterwards married. Seward stated in his autobiography that just before he left Orange County Judge Thompson, who was the oldest and most eminent citizen in that region, of the Wallowner of a small eminence that overlooked the valley of the Wallkill, told me that he remembered when the last Indian chief who | Mr. resided there took his leave and departed for the West. Mr. Thompson said his father asked the Indian why he should go away. The chief replied, "You have cut away the trees and let the sunlight upon the valley, and the Indian can no longer stay here."

Seward's removal to Auburn ends his direct associations with Orange County, as he lived the balance of his life in the town of his adoption. The main reason for his settling in Auburn was his adoption. that it was the chief town west of Albany with the exception of Utica. Auburn had a population in 1823 of 2,500 and was growing rapidly. Syracuse was then a village of a few hundred inhabitants, and Rochester and Buffalo were neither of them as large as Auburn

It might be interesting to pause here for a moment and point it that the town of Warwick in 1840, less than a century ago, when Seward was serving his first term as governor, had a popula-tion of 6,626, and stood fifteenth in the list of towns and cities tion of 6,626, and stood fifteenth in the list of towns and cities in the State. Newburgh had only a population of 9,833, and Fishkill, which is now Beacon, ranked ninth with 10,437, or a few hundred more than Poughkeepsie, with 10,066. New York was at this time the foremost agricultural State of the Union. It surpassed all others in the number of horses, cattle, sheep, and poultry which it possessed, and in the production of barley, oats, buckwheat, wool, hops, hay, potatoes, dairy products, fruits, and lumber. Governor Seward, in his first message to the legislature, included a recommendation for the erection by the State, at Albany, of a suitable monument in the memory of De Witt Clinton, under which his remains should be interred. In spite of the glowing tribute he paid to his fellow statesman from Orange County, the proposed legislation failed to pass, because there were, unfortunately, enough of De Witt Clinton's old foes left to prevent adop-nately, enough of De Witt Clinton's old foes left to prevent adoption of such a plan.

It might not be out of place on this occasion to suggest to some It might not be out of place on this occasion to suggest to some of our legislators from Orange County that the attempt to honor the memory of the organizer and builder of the Erie Canal should be renewed and consummated. The people of Orange County could well afford to take this monument to William H. Seward as an example of what generous and patriotic Americans are glad to do when given the opportunity to honor the memory of their foremost citizens by erecting lasting memorials. Why should not the patriotic citizens of Orange County inaugurate a suitable memorial in the town of New Windsor to Gov. George Clinton, of Revolutionary fame? Perhaps if the Federal Government will take over Temple Hill public subscriptions might be raised to place a monument to George Clinton in the town where he was born and lived during a long and honorable life, filled to the brim with important services to his State and Nation.

born and lived during a long and honorable life, filled to the brim with important services to his State and Nation.

At the age of 29 William H. Seward was elected a member of the State senate and became a leader of the newly formed Whig Party. When he was only 33 he was nominated by the Whigs for governor, but was defeated by William L. Marcy. However, Seward was elected governor in 1838 and again in 1840, and served the State during both his administrations with great distinction and ability. His industry was tireless and his capacity for work enormous.

ability. I

On leaving the Executive Mansion Seward retired quietly to On leaving the Executive Mansion Seward retired quietly to Auburn, where he built up a lucrative law practice. In 1849 he was elected by the Whig legislature to the United States Senate, where he continued to serve until appointed, in 1861, as Secretary of State by the immortal Lincoln. In the 12 years he served in the United States Senate he was always to be found on the side of justice and human rights. He opposed any compromise with slavery, and became, along with Sumner, Chase, and Wade, a recognized champion of freedom.

Let me quote a few lines from one of his most famous speeches.

slavery, and became, along with Sumner, Chase, and Wade, a recognized champion of freedom.

Let me quote a few lines from one of his most famous speeches against the extension of slavery, which discloses a fixed and determined policy: "But I will adopt none but lawful, constitutional, and peaceful means to secure even that end; and none such can I or will I forego."

He was a candidate for the Republican nomination for the Presidency in 1860, and it was generally expected that he would be nominated without difficulty, as he was the foremost candidate in the Republican Party and enjoyed the benefit of two terms as Governor of New York State and two terms as United States Senator. Governor Andrew, of Massachusetts, said of him when he was a candidate for the Presidency, "The affection of our hearts and the judgment of our intellects bound our political fortune to William H. Seward, to him who is the highest and most shining light of this political generation, to him who by the unanimous selection of the foes of our cause and our own has for years been the determined standard bearer of liberty." Seward, however, failed to be nominated by the Republican convention. Political fates decided otherwise, and Abraham Lincoln was nominated and elected President.

Nothing can show to better advantage Seward's lofty character

Nothing can show to better advantage Seward's lofty character and unselfish devotion to the public welfare than his loyal support of Lincoln during the campaign. He entered the canvass in behalf of his successful rival with the utmost energy and without a trace of bitterness. When he was appointed Secretary of State by Lincoln, he was immediately faced by the trying period of the Civil War, but so conducted the highly important duties of his office as to bring great honor to himself and the Nation, and won new laurels for American diplomacy throughout the civilized world.

William H. Seward ranks among our greatest Secretaries of State for the wisdom with which he guided our foreign policies through international difficulties during the appalling tempest of our Civil War. He even stood forth among that triumvirate of intellectual giants and administrators in Lincoln's Cabinet, Salmon

P. Chase, Secretary of the Treasury, and Edwin M. Stanton, Secretary of War.

Early in 1865, while Secretary Seward was confined to his bed by an accident and on the night of Lincoln's murder, he was attacked brutually in his home by a would-be assassin. After Lincoln's death Seward continued to serve as Secretary of State under President Andrew Johnson. In 1867 he rendered to the United President Andrew Johnson. In 1867 he rendered to the United States a notable service by the purchase of Alaska from Russia for $7,200,000.

for $7,200,000.

In the spring of 1869 he retired from public life, and within a few weeks was succeeded by my grandfather, Hamilton Fish, as Secretary of State in the Grant administration. My grandfather, I am proud to state, had much in common with Seward; both had been prominent Whigs in New York State, and had become Republicans because of their opposition to the extension of slavery and their belief in human rights. Both had served as Whig governors of New York, and from 1851 to 1857 they served together in the United States Senate as antislavery Whigs from the Empire State, where they became warm personal and political friends.

It has recently come to my attention that the present possession and control of Washington's headquarters at Newburgh, N. Y., was effected when my grandfather, Hamilton Fish, was Governor of New York in 1850. It is my sincere hope that as Representative in Congress from this district I will be able in the next session of Congress to secure adequate appropriations in order to acquire the land at Temple Hill in the town of New Windsor for a national shrine, where Washington refused an offer of a crown from his officers, and thereby established the Republic.

In conclusion, let me emphasize that although New York State has contributed only four Presidents to the Nation—Van Buren, Arthur, Cleveland, and Roosevelt—it has, however, given the services of many Secretaries of State, including John Jay, Martin Van Buren, William L. Marcy, William H. Seward, Hamilton Fish, William M. Evarts, Elihu Root, Robert Lansing, and Charles E. Hughes, and among these the public services, the brilliant record, and honorable career of William H. Seward, both in peace and in war, have never been surpassed. have never been surpassed.

In 1871 Seward made a trip around the world and was welcomed and acclaimed in every nation as the friend of liberty and America's foremost statesman. Soon after his return to Auburn, his ica's foremost statesman. Soon after his return to Auburn, his health gradually falling, his mind clear and serene, he waited the approach of death, which came on the 10th of October, 1872.

"Sympathy with his race, both with the mass and the individual, with the virtuous and for the degraded, with the happy and the unhappy, with the white man and the black, sympathy intense, unresting and universal," is the secret of Seward's character.

This fine statue of Seward was donated by his many admirers and was made possible through the generous contributions of George F. Baker, of Tuxedo, whose father served under Secretary Seward at Washington, and is himself a great public benefactor and a high-minded patriotic citizen who has done much to build and a high-minded, patriotic citizen, who has done much to build up the prosperity of our Nation.

In the presence of the fellow townsmen, and of the sons and grandsons of those who knew William H. Seward in his youth, I have the distinguished honor of dedicating this statue of that great Secretary of State to the American people, and to the perpetuation of those ideals of liberty and freedom for which he was the foremost champion in his day and generation.

INTERNATIONALISM FROM THE VERSAILLES TREATY TO 1932

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by me before the Executives' Club of Chicago on September 30, 1932. It is as follows:

Gentlemen of the Executives' Club of Chicago, for a long time in this country our leaders have been inviting us to look at only one face of a medal, and that face portrays the advisability and the benefits of extending the Nation's foreign contacts in all directions. The other face of the medal, which they do not disclose, shows something else, and it might be well for us to look at it.

In a speech which I made before the last Congress adjourned—

In a speech which I made before the last Congress adjourned—a speech from which the press of the country was not permitted to quote—I commented upon our favored position as a nation, upon our ability to dispense entirely, if we chose, with foreign markets outside the Western Hemisphere, and, without other foreign contacts, to go our accustomed way without privation or inconvenience. I said that intelligent control and administration of domestic relationships has never been difficult, and that it was in the field of foreign contacts that the causes of the present depression were to be sought.

I have no doubt that if, after 1924, we had reasonably limited these foreign contacts, especially financial contacts, there would have been no dislocation in our economic and financial structure and our prosperity to-day would be as great as it was then. The year 1924 marked the beginning of our private loans to Europe under the direction of the international bankers, thus carrying out the now known unfortunate plans of Montague Norman and his foreign associates.

I have no doubt whatever that the citizenship of this country could peaceably compose and settle its own differences; that prop-erty rights, the right to work for a just wage, the maintenance of a sound currency and the equitable use of credit, the proper use of the taxing power, the administration of law, the preservation of the freedom of conscience, and the dispensing of justice are questions that could be settled and adjusted to the satisfaction of the people and the maintenance of the national welfare.

They are easily soluble if not complicated by the action of invisible forces coming from abroad, because cause and effect are

They are easily soluble if not complicated by the action of invisible forces coming from abroad, because cause and effect are visible, their circumstances are tangible, and they are therefore understandable. But when they are interfered with, and are made contingent and dependent upon foreign relationships not publicly disclosed, and of which the public can therefore understand but little, their solution is no longer in the hands of public opinion. We all become dependent and are at the mercy of government.

These same influences are still in operation. In proof of this let me cite that in the closing days of the last session of Congress, late in the day when only a handful of the membership of the House of Representatives was present, the present Secretary of State, through the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House, brought up and passed a bill giving the President and the State Department authority in advance to participate in an international conference supposedly on the subject of silver, as the House was led to believe, but an attempt was made to broaden the scope to include many subjects other than silver. Now since the conferences at Lausanne and Geneva and the private conferences in both of these places as well as in London and Paris, the uncertainty of just what is to be discussed at this conference becomes readily apparent. Press advices from foreign centers indicate that the agenda for the conference is now being prepared in Geneva, Switzerland; that Norman H. Davis and Ambassador Sackett are the official representatives of the United States; that the first meeting may be called the latter part of October in Sackett are the official representatives of the United States; that Sackett are the official representatives of the United States; that the first meeting may be called the latter part of October in London, but that this meeting will probably adjourn until after the American elections are over. The international minds in our Government fear the injection of this plan into our present political campaign. Why, I wonder?

The analysis of the former activities of our two representatives at this conference discloses that Norman H. Davis is the same gentleman who has sat in on practically all of these international conferences since and including the treaty of Versailles and entirely satisfactorily to the international bankers, who have controlled all these conferences and who will control this new conference. We must also consider the important part that Ambassador Sackett took in the moratorium negotiations of a year ago and the part that he has been taking since then looking toward a dor Sackett took in the moratorium negotiations of a year ago and the part that he has been taking since then looking toward a reduction of German reparations and war debts. Mr. Norman H. Davis is also one of our prominent negotiators at the disarmament conference, which will probably assemble in February of next year. We must understand that this coming international conference is important to the American people; international relations, exchange, gold, tariffs, war debts, disarmament, League of Nations, World Court, and Japan, China, Russia, and the Far Fast are all involved. East are all involved.

Benefiting by the experience of the President in granting the moratorium without the legal approval of the Congress, the administration in this important matter decided to take no chances, so it secured in advance the approval of the Congress, without again placing before the House the full purpose and intention of the conference.

What we need in our foreign and domestic affairs is frank, what we need in our lotering and domestic analis is rains, per, honest dealings with the American people, who, after all, are the most interested parties. Decisions affecting the United States and its people should be made in the United States free from any foreign influences.

The situation need not have come about. It was not a necessity of the situation of the people should be stated in the state of the situation of the state o patriotic sary result of the war in Europe. Strong, national, patriotic policies alone were needed after the war to maintain the incomparable strength of the American civilization. Such policies were

Foreign forces have been permitted at will to invade the domestic field and devastate our domestic economy, and I see no prospect of a return to our ancient security until the people of the country take their Government out of the incompetent and untrustworthy hands that still hold power and which have plunged this Republic into foreign adventures contrary to its genius and its tradition. This influence I am referring to is not political, it is bipartisan. International influences know no parties except the party in power.

I see no prospect of a return of our prosperity until we have an administration in power which, conscious of the support of the people, will summarily terminate the dipping of foreign hands into our common till, the enriching of foreign states and foreign financiers at the expense of the American public, the entanglement of American diplomacy in insincere leagues or nations, world courts, and world banks, the officious meddling with the policies of foreign states under Kellogg pacts, and the false theories that the safety, prosperity, and welfare of the American people are dependent not upon their own strong hearts but upon the grace dependent not upon their own strong hearts but upon the grace of foreign powers.

When we have freed ourselves from the grip of the foreign octopus upon our White House, State and Treasury Departments, and placed in each a nationalist and a patriot, we may fairly look for a quick return of those conditions which the founding fathers bequeathed to succeeding generations, and which never ought to have been tampered with.

I might talk to you about the domestic aspects of unemployment, the stagnation in our domestic trade, the condition of our banks and of credit, of taxation, the relation of the Federal Government to private industry, or about farm relief—these things are vital—but I would only waste my time and yours in talking about cures which do not cure. The cure lies in a change in our foreign policies, for it is the policies of a group of men who have controlled our Government since the armistice that have brought upon us the domestic ills from which we suffer.

upon us the domestic ills from which we suffer.

Stated briefly, it has been the policy of those who controlled in Europe and those who controlled in Washington—and this policy was agreed upon and adopted in the Paris peace conference—to make rich America pay bankrupt Europe the cost of its war, and to do this regardless of the moral aspects of the policy.

But, you will ask, why should those who controlled in Washington be willing to sacrifice the American people to the interests of the foreigner? The answer is that they were controlled by the powerful international bankers of New York, who, although they had our confidence and were looked up to by the bankers throughout the country, were in the service of foreign governments from the beginning. from the beginning.

throughout the country, were in the service of foreign governments from the beginning.

They displaced President Wilson in the Peace Conference by disloyal and seditious methods, abandoned support of the peace agreement he had made with the enemy, joined with the allied statesmen in a peace of conquest which violated honor and international law and which they had determined to substitute for the Wilson peace agreement. They joined with them in a tricky provision in the treaty of Versailles which contemplated that the American people should pay a colossal German indemnity in cash to the Allies in exchange for the right to collect it from Germany in annual installments for 50 years. This purpose, never openly disclosed, underlies the obscurities of the reparations question. These international bankers—and I shall name them to you as I named them in Congress in the last session—climbed to great political influence, some in the Republican Party and some in the Democratic Party; and they used this influence after the war to place their agents in the State, Treasury, and Commerce Departments (and their influence was noticed even in the White House) in order that the policies embedded in the treaty of Versailles might be put into execution in America. They became dominant over our Executive Office and they dominate it to-day. They fixed its foreign policy after the war, and they are fixing it now.

Let us see first how they attained power. The Wilson peace agreement with Germany, in which the Allied Supreme War Council had joined, was not a peace of conquest, and provided only a limited sum for reparations. But no sooner had the Supreme War Council accepted it and Germany had given up her arms than they determined to repudiate it, conquer Germany by starvation after the armistice, and impose a peace of conquest and a war penalty of $33,000,000.

and a war penalty of $33,000,000,000.

The Reparations Commission was organized in secrecy in February, and it was in the secret proceedings of this commission that President Wilson was betrayed in his absence from Paris, his peace settlement repudiated, and the $33,000,000,000 indemnity imposed upon Germany. Bernard M. Baruch and Norman H. Davis were the American members of this commission. They deserted President Wilson, violated his instructions, and allied themselves with the Supreme War Council in the settlements of the treaty. They did not content themselves with replacing the limited.

They did not content themselves with replacing the limited reparations of the Wilson peace agreement by a crushing indemnity which Germany was to pay the Allies. They did something more far-reaching. They joined in an agreement that Germany should give bonds to the Allies for the amount of the indemnity, that the bonds should be negotiable, and that each allied government might sell the cheef the bonds to restrict the content of the cont indemnity, that the bonds should be negotiable, and that each allied government might sell its share of the bonds to private purchasers for cash. It was their expectation that these bonds should be sold chiefly in the United States.

The result would be, as I have just said, that the American people would pay the German war indemnity to the Allies in cash in exchange for the right to collect it in annual installments from Germany if they could. They have been trying to sell these bonds here from that day to this. This is what the French mean when they talk of "security." France would feel entirely secure when the Government at Washington had the responsibility of keeping Germany disarmed and making her pay.

on this question of security to France, I am concerned on account of the recent utterances of the Secretary of State, Henry L. Stimson, referring to consultative pacts, and the remarks of our Ambassador to France, Walter E. Edge, at the recent unveiling of an American statue on the battlefields of France relative to of an American statue on the battlefields of France relative to our guaranteeing to France our cooperation in case France was ever again attacked. This is what Woodrow Wilson wanted to do with France. This is what the Congress of the United States has heretofore refused to do. And this is what the American people will never agree to do. If you do not agree with this view, inquire of any of the soldiers who fought for the United States in the World War. This is the price France is asking in return for that which she is bound to do in the Treaty of Versailles, which is being so pertinently pointed out by Germany these days in refusing to attend any more parleys on disarmament until at least France and England have disarmed as agreed in that treaty, which treaty at any cost France insists on keeping in that treaty, which treaty at any cost France insists on keeping operative.

operative.

The senior Senator from my own State, Hon. DAVID AIKEN REED, has been spending the summer in Italy, France, and England, and has been holding conferences with foreign government heads and from his recent utterances, as reported in the press, is apparently speaking with authority. He joined with Ambassador Edge in a recent statement which reaffirmed the previous assurances to France of security, and went further and assumed to advise Germany in regard to disarmament and the Versailles treaty. This statement was so bold on the part of Senator Reed, who is a member of the Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, that the President saw fit to restate the fact that the United States was not a party to the Versailles treaty. But notwithstanding this restatement of fact, the statements of our ambassador to France, the statement of our Secretary of State, and bassador to France, the statement of our Secretary of State, and the statement of Senator Reed still stand, and these assurances are understood in France and are an influence in the determination which France is now making in regard to disarmament. I wonder—are we trading security to France for her agreement to forego the security she has in the treaty of Versailles? I ask the question. Let the negotiators answer to the American people.

But to go back for a moment to the peace conference. The Germans, after the armistice, presented a desperate passive resistance to the peace of slavery. The resistance had to be passive because they had now given up their arms. It carried them to the brink of destruction from starvation, for the British Navy and the allied armies hemmed them in to prevent the importation of food. The Reparation Commission merely waited until starvation compelled the Germans to admit conquest and to sell themselves into slavery in order that they might have food and live. This point was reached late in March, 1919, when a conference was arranged at Brussels where the Germans were to accept the terms.

accept the terms.

Herbert Hoover had preceded President Wilson to Europe and became head of the agencies of food relief there. He was allowed to feed the starving people in Austria and the liberated regions, but not in Germany. He protested against the discrimination against Germany, as a part of the written terms of peace were promises of food relief there. He was, however, prevailed upon to accept the orders of the supreme war council, which excluded Germany from the beneficent administrations of the American Relief Association. Indeed, so powerful was the influence of the international bankers here at home, and of the allied embassies in Washington, that in appropriating $100,000,000 for relief in Europe the Congress in February provided that none of it was to be expended in Germany.

At the conference in Brussels in March, which I just spoke of, Herbert Hoover was chairman of the American delegation, and Thomas W. Lamont, of J. P. Morgan & Co., and Hugh Gibson, our present minister to Belgium, and Norman H. Davis, one of the delegates to the present Geneva Disarmament Conference, among these were members. Belgium to shiect submission by starvage delegates to the present Geneva Disarmament Conference, among others, were members. Reduced to abject submission by starvation, with allied armies and navies seeing to it that no food entered, the Germans gave up all their gold and negotiable securities, two billions in value, in exchange for a promise of monthly supplies of food, and signed the obligation to issue $33,000,000,000 of negotiable bonds which were to be used for the purpose which I have heretofore stated. I might add that no official accounting as ever published of the sums handed over by Germany in the Brussels conference.

As to Germany's future liability for payment of the indemnity of $33,000,000,000, the sudden creation in this way of monetary values at the end of the war in such an amount is what has made a financial madhouse of the world since that date. It is a made a financial madhouse of the world since that date. It is a sum, whether of dollars or anything else, which is practically beyond the comprehension of the human mind, yet the supreme war council, knowing that Europe was bankrupt at the end of the war, nevertheless created it as a European obligation in dollars. It had no actuality, but would take on actuality if the American people could be deceived about it and would buy the bonds. If they could be induced to invest their billions in them they could be made to pay for Europe's war.

I do not intend to take my time, which is all too short to properly cover this subject, to go into the continuous efforts which have been made to sell these reparation bonds here. Bonds for $13,000 000,000 were offered under the London ultimatum in 1921, and for $4,000,000,000 under the Dawes plan in 1924. In neither case did the international bankers succeed in getting them on sale in the United States.

on sale in the United States.

But after Mr. Hoover became President in 1929, the Young plan reparation bonds, which were created to the amount of $3,250,000,000 were offered in the United States without governmental opposition. Fortunately less than a hundred million of them were sold, and at this time they are a drug in the market.

The irreparable injury which was done to the American dollar and to the financial security of every American citizen by this dishonest intrigue in Europe in 1919 consisted in the injection into the real monetary wealth of the world of $33,000,000,000 of financial water. Its venal or stupid acceptance by our leading financiers and by our Government as a reality deceived our entire population; it was against the assumption that this asset of $33,000,000,000 in Europe was genuine that the American president population; it was against the assumption that this asset of $33,000,000,000 in Europe was genuine that the American people were in 1924 induced by the international crowd to believe that billions might be safely invested there. It was only because of this assumption that the European governments and the international bankers were able to dispose in this country of the billions of dollars' worth of questionable European bonds which were sold have between 1024 and 1020. The whole concention was an ashere between 1924 and 1929. The whole conception was an astounding financial device for comprehensively transferring most of our monetary wealth to Europe less the substantial bankers' profits, and that it has succeeded to such a large extent accounts for our state of industrial depression and financial dislocation to-day.

It is against this bankground that the questions of to-day ought to be considered. And in the light of these underlying facts,

President Hoover's account of his stewardship in his acceptance

President Hoover's account of his stewardship in his acceptance speech is not convincing. Its explanations of cause and effect leave something to be desired.

He says that the last three years have been a time of unparalleled calamity, and with this we may agree, but he would indicate to us that we are collectively responsible for what has happened, and with this it is not so easy to agree. He says that we were prosperous after the war, and that from optimism some of us went to overexpansion, and from that to reckless speculation, out of which grew the weeds of waste, exploitation, and abuse of financial power; that all the world joined in this; and that three years ago came retribution by the inevitable world-wide slump. He says it was "the normal penalty for a reckless boom." This explanation is plausible but inadequate. In 1924 Europe had completed the payment to us of its great postwar trade balance in gold. Except for the public debts owed to us, our balance sheet completed the payment to us of its great postwar trade balance in gold. Except for the public debts owed to us, our balance sheet with Europe was practically closed. Our monetary wealth was adequate, and our credit was not overexpanded. Our credit was needed for enterprises at home, and this fact ought to have been made the basis of Government policy. To venture it thereafter by billions in Europe could lead only to disaster. But, as I have explained heretofore, a false conception here of Europe's credit power had been created by the financial settlements of the treaty of Versailles. I have just told you who were responsible for these settlements.

The bankers' propaganda of prosperity in Europe which, with the approval of our State, Treasury, and Commerce Departments, accompanied the Dawes plan completely deceived the American public and induced them to part with their billions in ruinous investments in European bonds. Nineteen hundred and twentyinvestments in European bonds. Nineteen hundred and twentyfour was the fatal year when false policies in Washington set us on the downward path.

The "inevitable" slump three years ago, therefore, was not "retribution" for the sins of the American people, nor was it
"the normal penalty for a reckless boom," as President Hoover tells us; it was the result of a comprehensive deception of the American investing public by its Government, and that deception was the direct consequence of the Brussels conference in March, 1919, where Mr. Hoover and Mr. Thomas W. Lamont, of J. P.
Morgan & Co., in association with the Allied Supreme War Council, imposed a $33,000,000,000 indemnity upon Germany and funded it in negotiable bonds payable to bearer. This was an asset, if real, against which American investors might safely loan any amount of money to Europe. Let us not pin upon the American people collectively sins which they did not create. Let us place responsibility where it properly belongs.

The President makes the somewhat surprising statement that after the collapse in 1929 the Government adopted policies which after the collapse in 1929 the Government adopted policies which were fitting to the situation and that gradually the country began to right itself; that 18 months ago there was a sound basis for hope that recovery was in sight.

There was not the slightest chance 18 months ago that there There was not the slightest chance 18 months ago that there could be improvement, for the real cause of the trouble was the false asset of German reparation bonds, which had induced American banks and investors to risk billions in worthless European securities. This false asset still remained. The Hoover administration, which had just taken office, far from disabusing the public mind regarding it, threw its open support to the Young plan and distinguished itself by becoming the first administration since the war to permit the reparation bonds to be placed on sale in Wall Street. The fact that this Government allowed the Young plan reparation bonds to be offered to American investors in 1930 and expressed its high approval of the Young plan settlements at a time when bad credits in Europe were already threatening currency stability here rededicated the American people to the vast exploitation contemplated in the treaty of Versailles. While it remained possible to flood the United States with a $3,000,000,000 issue of German reparation bonds, there could be no return here to a regime under which money and property were safe.

The power of the American people to resist deleterious foreign influences is very great. If they had had an upstanding, patrictic Government in power after the war to protect them from the aggressions of the international bankers there would have been aggressions of the international bankers there would have been very little trouble. They are not at the mercy of the foreigner; it is in their power to protect themselves.

But let us see how the President looks at it.

"Eighteen months ago," he says "there was a sound basis for hope that recovery was in sight. Then there came to us a new calamity, a blow from abroad of such dangerous character as to strike at the very safety of the Republic. * * *

"New blows from decreasing world consumption and from falling financial systems rained upon us; the world-wide storm grew to financial systems rained upon us; the world-wide storm grew to hurricane force and the greatest economic emergency in all the history of the world. Unexpected, unforeseen, and violent shocks with every month brought new dangers and new emergencies; fear and apprehension gripped the heart of our people in every fear and apprehension gripped the heart of our people in every village and city."

This new calamity, the President explains, came because the countries of Europe were unable to withstand the depression. But at that time nothing was happening there to unduly alarm public opinion here. It was not until last autumn that our troubles began to greatly disturb the public. The great New York banks had loaned about $2,000,000,000 in Germany, and when last autumn it appeared that Germany might default on these loans their solvency was menaced, and because the fate of many smaller banks throughout the country was dependent on the condition of these New York banks, a condition of public anxiety developed | throughout the country.

But the important fact is that if through proper administration of our Federal reserve system we had kept our billions at home after 1924 nothing of the kind could have happened. Depression in Europe, decreasing world consumption, and falling financial systems could have contained very little menace to us. If these blows rained upon us and struck at the very safety of the Republic, as President Hoover pictures it, it was because the distinguished gentlemen who were responsible for the treaty of Versailles had continued in authority in Washington and had so overstated the credit capacity of Europe to the American investing public that they loaned billions of dollars there with the disastrous consequences of which the President speaks.

Decreasing world consumption and falling financial systems can never "in themselves" be a menace to us. Menace can only come from the reckless lending abroad of great sums of American capi-tal. President Hoover himself told us in his speech at Indianapolis sometime ago that the shrinkage in our foreign trade had been not more than from 2 to 3 per cent of our entire productivity. Now, if President Hoover knew, as he did, that our entire foreign trade is less than 10 per cent of our domestic trade, and that its shrinkage was only 2 per cent of our entire productivity, he must have known that such a relatively small item could not bring a departure depression upon us not bring a dangerous depression upon us.

He knew that the combined efforts of our State, Treasury, and Commerce Departments and of the international bankers in New York had led the American public to invest billions in European bonds between the years 1924 and 1929. He knew that as a result there was an abnormal activity in our foreign trade because those who had borrowed the money were spending it here. But by 1929 they could not even keep up the interest on their immense borrowings and could float no new loans. Their purchasing power, therefore, suddenly fell, and this fact, together with the domestic overexpansion and reckless speculation which this artificial stimulation of our foreign trade created, brought on the collapse of October, 1929.

lapse of October, 1929.

The records show that during the past decade we have exported more of our capital wealth than we have of merchandise. Both have been consumed by Europe.

Should we continue the folly? American capital earned in America should be used in America to develop our resources and provide employment for the American people who made possible the building up of this surplus American capital.

I am not at all in sympathy with the investment by our larger industrial interests of a part of their capital "tax free" in the building and establishing of branches or factories to manufacture American goods or raw material abroad. It is one of the reasons for increased unemployment in the United States and is contrary to the principles which have built up our country.

Only a nation-wide deception as to the credit capacity could have brought these unfavorable conditions about. The hurricane which, as I have just said, did not come 18 months ago, as the President says it did, but came eight months ago, ought not to have caused surprise to anybody in Washington. I will speak of its immediate causes later. We became vulnerable to a finan-cial hurricane only because we had extended credits of billions to the European financiers, who were therefore able to raid our money market.

Yet the explanation given of why these foreign events affected us so adversely is that "we are part of the world, the disturbance of whose remotest populations affects our financial system, our employment, our markets, and prices of our farm products."

These statements are not true. They may be applicable to Great Britain and to other countries which are primarily dependent upon foreign trade, but they are not applicable to the United States. We are peculiarly a self-contained nation. No nation was ever so independent of foreign products as we are. The recent shock which came upon us from abroad was not caused by the cessation of foreign trade; it was caused by a reckless foreign-loan policy. It is an absurdity and a crime that our vast domestic market should be permitted by our Government to be wrecked because the Nation's capital is diverted from it and squandered in disastrous adventures abroad. disastrous adventures abroad.

Where the shrinkage in a nation's foreign trade is less than 3 per cent of its total productivity there is no sound reason why disturbances in other parts of the world should affect its financial system, its employment, its markets, and the price of its farm products, much less strike fear and apprehension to the hearts of its people in every village and city.

Before I close I want to tell you something about this "hurricane" that came from Europe, not 18 months ago but 8 months ago. It began to gather force after President Hoover proposed his moratorium, and there is much reason to think proposed his moratorium, and there is much reason to think that the moratorium proposal precipitated it.

In the autumn of 1930 the French were greatly irritated when the Hitler forces, flatly opposed to the payment of further reparations, made great gains in the German elections, and when, at the same time, the offer of Young plan reparation bonds on the American market fell flat. They had over $2,000,000,000 in these bonds which they wished to market in the United States. They were even more irritated when Britain and Italy began to fall away from the entente and to show a purpose of supporting Germany.

Imagine, if you please, the predicament we of the United States would have been in had the international bankers succeeded in unloading on the American public these $2,000,000,000 of commercialized reparation bonds in 1929–30 as they had hoped to do. The Lausanne conference would have meant much more to our people when they agreed to cancel 90 per cent of the reparations. This would have resulted in a 90 per cent loss on $2,000,000,000 then held by American investors. Is it any wonder the American people are thred of the leadership of the international bankers in the handling of our international affairs?

When the plans for the Austro-German customs union were

When the plans for the Austro-German customs union were announced in the spring of 1931 the French accepted this as a declaration of war, and they determined to reduce all Europe to French mastery. German finance was involved in Austria, British finance was involved in Germany, and American finance was involved in Germany and Austria. The French knew that they could precipitate bankruptcy all along the line in Europe and that with a weak government in Washington they might threaten the dollar. By means of these threats they thought that they might compel a realignment in support of the treaty of Versailles.

Now, in the events which followed Decision.

Versailles.

Now, in the events which followed President Hoover supported French policy. The first support given was in the action of Ambassador Hugh Gibson in signing the following agreement reached in the preliminary disarmament conference:

"The present convention shall not in any way diminish the obligations of previous treaties under which certain of the high contracting parties agreed to limit their military, naval, and air armament, and thus fixed in relation to one another their respective rights and obligations in this convention."

spective rights and obligations in this convention." It is said that our Government's reason for doing this was to support the naval agreements of 1921 and subsequently, but it was in fact notice to Germany that she was now obligated to the United States to remain disarmed as provided by the treaty of Another event just after the announcement of the Austro-German customs union further aligned the United States with France. This occurred when the American delegation in the meeting of the International Chamber of Commerce at Washington went on record as opposed to the Austro-German customs union on the ground that it violated the most-favored nation clause of the treaties with Germany.

The French were therefore aware that Washington supported them in their general policy; they desired the integral preservation of the treaty of Versailles and of the Young plan, and so did the White House. They wished to use German reparations in bargaining for the reduction or cancellation of the allied debts to the United States and to this President House, had no objection. United States, and to this President Hoover had no objection.

the United States, and to this President Hoover had no objection. In May, 1931, the French threw the Austrian creditanstalt into insolvency. As this threatened the solvency of both Germany and Britain, the French expected it to force those governments into an agreement with France. If they had been left alone, they might have succeeded; or they might have failed in the face of a coalition of Britain, Italy, and Germany against them and been compelled to agree to the cancellation of reparations and the revision of the Versailles treaty.

At this point President Hoover intervened with his moratorium vision of the Versailles treaty.

At this point President Hoover intervened with his moratorium proposal. It was unwelcome to the French because it did not safeguard the Young plan. The French determined to force Europe and America both to meet their terms.

Within two weeks they forced President Hoover to modify the moratorium proposal so as to preserve the negotiable Young plan bonds, and at the same time they launched their financial raid upon Germany by overthrowing the Darmstaedter Bank. These were the first gusts of the "hurricane" after President Hoover's moratorium and not before.

Having forced Washington by the Franco-American agreement to become a guarantor of the Young plan, the French continued their financial offensive against all Europe by attacking the Bank of England. The pound became shaky last August. The New York banks, like the English, had hundreds of millions in short-term loans risked in Germany. Financial panic began to develop here; loans risked in Germany. Financial panic began to develop here; our stocks fell to new lows. Then in September the bankers succeeded in effecting the "standstill" agreement, but England went ceeded in effecting the "standstill" agreement, but England went off the gold basis.

Having reduced all Europe to subjection, and at the same time having shaken the solvency of great New York banks, the French directed their attention to an attempt to shake the American dollar in order to change the debt policies of our Congress. It began to be whispered around that the European central banks had $2,000,000,000 in gold here, and that, if they withdrew it, anything might happen to our finances. Paris was full of rumors that America was going off gold, and the French people were hoarding American gold pieces.

None took the situation more seriously than President Hoover.

None took the situation more seriously than President Hoover. Fearing what the French might do, he invited Laval, their Prime Minister, here to ask that France and the United States cooperate in supporting the gold standard. But the things which Laval wanted the Congress was opposed to, and Mr. Hoover could not offer Mr. Laval enough. Laval went home and the raid on the American gold began in earnest. It continued uninterruptedly from last autumn until last June. Only the other day Secretary Mills stated that between September 21 and the end of October we lost $750,000,000 in gold, and the total amount was over a billion and a quarter.

But the United States was in a stronger position than France thought, and the French exhausted their power to withdraw without being able to overthrow the dollar. A few months ago the great French gold raid ended.

The withdrawal of so much gold, however, from our domestic credit base was a serious thing. It enormously aggravated the condition of frozen credits, created panic, and instigated hoarding. This required the extraordinary legislation in Congress during the last session. This was when the "hurricane" blew; the President makes an error of only a year in its date.

The French bid for world power failed. Instead of bringing Germany to the feet of France, it extraordinarily stimulated that people to defy the whole status quo of the treaty of Versailles. In the midst of the "hurricane" last January, Minister Breuning, of Germany, notified the Allies definitely that Germany would pay no more reparations, and the decision was accepted as final by the whole world. Last June $27,000,000,000 of water was squeezed out of the world's money stocks when the German reparation bonds of the world's money stocks when the German reparation bonds were annulled at Lausanne.

President Hoover would have guaranteed France that the status quo of the treaty of Versailles should be maintained, he would have guaranteed the Young plan, he would have canceled or reduced the allied debts in return for a cut in German reparations, reduced the ained debts in return for a cut in German reparations, but he could not carry the Congress with him. When the French found that he could not do these things they turned their financial guns on the United States in the hope of bringing this Government to its knees. When all Europe saw that the French effort to do this was falling it rose en masse against France, and the Gallic frenzy to rule the world was cooled.

Just as there was no hurricane 18 months ago, the American recole were not going through enother Velley Forge 14 months ago.

Just as there was no hurricane 18 months ago, the American people were not going through another Valley Forge 14 months ago. The only acute peril from Europe manifested itself last autumn, when the bankers had to negotiate the "standstill" agreement, and it continued through the winter while the French were making their vicious run upon our gold. As the President saw the situation on Lincoln's birthday last February, "we were fighting on a hundred fronts." It would have been more within reason to say we were fighting on one and were winning the battle.

The administration has been too willing to use its power to support the French insistence upon the maintenance of the status quo of the treaty of Versailles. Most of its troubles have come from this fact. The minds of President Hoover, Mr. Bernard M. Baruch, Mr. Norman H. Davis, and Mr. Thomas W. Lamont go back too fondly to the days of the Brussels conference of March, 1919, and their instincts rise to the protection of their handiwork. But the world has outrun them; their views are antiquated and their policies outworn. They created the German reparations, and they policies outworn. They created the German reparations, and they plunged the world into a nightmare of misunderstanding, suspicion, hate, and hypocrisy for 13 years. Now they have failed, and what was begun at Versailles has ended futilely at Lausanne. What we need now is the establishment of an intellectual quarantine against the specious and misleading ideas that pour in upon us from Europe. The turmoil of hatreds and irrationalities there ought to have but little interest for us. In fact, the American people are not interested in them. It is the international bankers and their agents in our Government who would subordinate our natural interests to those of the foreigner, and they make nate our natural interests to those of the foreigner, and they make of our press a means of propaganda for the European cause. A speaker before the American Newspaper Publishers' Association recently threw an interesting light on the real facts. He stated that only 10 per cent of the men and women readers of the nine large city papers said that they were interested in foreign news, and that the interest of the readers of small dailies is negligible. By what right does any administration at Washington assume that the American people desire to abandon their natural position of isolation which affords them security and every opportunity for grandiose schemes of foreign adventure based upon whatever principle or theory?

ciple or theory?

For the good of the country we need in the White House less excitability, less sentimentality, less susceptibility to fears, less exaggeration of national dangers, less credulity. We need more accuracy in economic statement, more confidence in the national stability, more poise, more courage, more patriotism.

This European excursion ought to be enough in the annals of this Republic. It is time to turn back to the Nation's broad highthis Republic. It is time to turn back to the Nation's broad highway. The green fields, the bright waters, and the blue skies of the United States, its busy marts, and its modern factories give to its people all the scope that they need; its people give to its markets all the business they require; and its interests give to its statesmen all the opportunity that their ambitions ought to seek. If we have any fighting to do, let it be upon our own frontiers, and not upon a hundred fronts where we have no business to stand. It is enough to keep our own frontiers, geographical, political, and financial, safe and well guarded so that "fear and apprehension" need not grip the hearts of our people in every willage and city.

The régime of the Versailles treaty has been an age of misery and disappointments, of betrayals and swindles. The Europeans have brought it to an end at Lausanne. Let us bring it to an end here.

HON. J. CHARLES LINTHICUM

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks I include the following tribute of Hon. MILLARD E. TYDINGS, United States Senator from Maryland:

J. Charles Linthicum was one of those men who are most use of those men who are most useful in the world. Possessed of marked ability, he exercised high qualities with no unequal emphasis in all his contacts.

During two decades of honorable, industrious, and competent service in the House of Representatives, four years of which it was my privilege to serve with him in the Maryland delegation, there was never at any time any doubt that he would be found unhesitatingly on the side of right and justice. He was always relied upon to labor untiringly for the best interests of the Nation, and he was indefatigable in working for the benefit of his State and city, taking up matters concerning them as a matter of course, whether urged by his constituents or not. Indeed, when important groups of the citizenry did approach him to elicit his interest and assistance, they usually found that he had anticipated them and was already taking action in their behalf. For that reason, among many others, he possessed the affection and confidence of the people of Maryland as few men have done.

But, well-rounded Representative that he was, his efforts were by no means centered upon the welfare of his congressional district and his native State. All activities of our Government received his careful study and intelligent and sane action; his wide acquaintance with both national and international matters was manifested by the fact that at the height of his public career, which was terminated by his greatly deplored death, he was chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, which deals with our far-flung contacts with the rest of the world.

As a lawyer, citizen, husband, and friend he was noted for his far-flung contacts with the rest of the world.

As a lawyer, citizen, husband, and friend he was noted for his earnestness and purity of purpose, his gentleness of heart, and his broad charity toward his fellow men. He wore well, whether in the political, professional, or social circles of his activities. Of him it might well be said: "Behold the upright man and just."

To seek to separate the man from his attainments, to differentiate between his accomplishments and his ideals would be to lose the dominant note in the melody of his life. Whether in one walk or another—in Nation, State, or home—the motive was the same. He gave rich expression to a tried and experienced high-mindedness. high-mindednes

The hope and ambition of our young men and women of to-day is fostered and fed by the character of the men the people of this Republic send to our National Legislature, our highest lawmaking body. Mr. Linthicum's example is a potent teacher to the young people of his State and district. Example teaches without a tongue. It is silent, but its action for good is more forcible than words, however eloquent. Mr. Linthicum left no enemy in Congress or elsewhere. His life, his character, his career will always be a grateful memory to his kindred, his acquaintances, and his colleagues.

A STATEMENT OF STEWARDSHIP

Mr. THATCHER. Mr. Speaker, now that I am retiring from the House, I deem it appropriate to make a few observations of a general character. It is with genuine regret that I take leave of my associates here. This is especially true as regards my fellow members of the Appropriations Committee. During the entire period of my service in this body-that is to say, 10 years-I have been on the Appropriations Committee, and the association involved has been of a most cherished character.

WORK OF THE APPROPRIATIONS COMMITTEE

The work performed by the Appropriations Committee is not of a spectacular character, but it is of the greatest importance to the Nation. If there is to be found in either branch of the Congress a committee devoted to representing the interest of the taxpayers it is the House Committee on Appropriations. During the 10 years I have been a member of the committee it has cut or reduced estimates of the President and the Bureau of the Budget by something like a billion dollars. It is not a legislative committee. It does not report legislation except in occasional the question of appropriations and cases affecting expenditures.

In the submission of Budget estimates the President must be governed by the laws enacted by the Congress authorizing and directing that appropriations be made, and the Appropriations Committee of the two Houses must be similarly governed. But the executive authority of the Government can and should address itself to the holding to the lowest possible levels the expenditures authorized by general law. It is an interesting and significant fact, therefore, that since the Budget system was adopted in 1921. the House Appropriations Committee has been able to cut a billion dollars and more from the executive estimates and recommendations for expenditure; and the Congress, in making the actual appropriations for Federal purposes, has accepted and approved the action of this committee. No committee of either House is freer from partisan influence than is this one. In all this work of the committee and in the formulation and conduct of its policies I believe that I have made my full contribution of time and energy and whatever ability I may have possessed. In brief, I have tried to represent the taxpayers of the Nation, and in all this work of the House Committee on Appropriations I have sought to do my bit. I feel, therefore, a pride and | new armies and fleets abroad, which may be used against gratification in the committee's record and wish that the country might better understand the tasks, labors, and achievements of the committee.

FARM PROBLEMS

Since I have been a Member of the Congress I have voted against what I considered price-fixing measures and the like. I have supported various measures having for their purpose the betterment of agriculture; but the more radical types I have opposed. I have believed that many proposals which have been pushed forward in recent years would, if enacted into law, add to the burdens of the already overburdened farmers and taxpayers and would help no one. I am willing to see a reasonable amount of experimentation tried, if there are no tax burdens involved, but the trouble with most of such proposals is that about the only results they would accomplish, in my judgment, would be heavy outlays of tax money and the raising up of new hordes of officeholders to eat out the substance of the people. The farmer, like other classes of our people, must have reasonable credit extensions accorded and maintained. Then, with slow and patient steps, he must make his way forward to recovery.

I do not say that legislation may not be devised to accelerate his progress, but in my judgment most of the legislation proposed for his benefit has been visionary and unworkable, with heavy administration costs involved.

OUR ECONOMIC SITUATION

Our economic embarrassment has been chiefly occasioned by the World War. That great conflict unsettled the economic and moral structure of the entire earth. Its cost to our people has already been more than $35,000,000,000. This is a staggering total and our Nation reels under its Atlas load. Added to this is the era of extravagance through which we, as a people, have been passing. We have been literally corrupted with credit. Almost everything except salvation itself has been purchased or procured on the installment or deferred payment plan. Finally the day of reckoning came and we were unable to pay. No one has preached the gospel of thrift. Only those who have advocated the policy of spending have been audible, and far too well have their voices been heeded. As individuals, as States, and as a Nation we have lived beyond our meansfar beyond them-and the day of judgment finally dawned. There can be no permanent prosperity unless we have thrift as a general policy. When we have enduring thrift we build up our reserves, and when we spend from our reserves rather than through an abuse of credit we will have safe financial conditions, and, in time, normal prosperity.

The $11,000,000,000 loaned the allied nations during and just after the close of the World War, were funds of the taxpayers of America, and should be repaid. If this great sum, with accrued interest, were in our Federal Treasury to-day, our Budget could be balanced, and our problems would vanish overnight. We have been more than fair with our debtor nations, and they could pay us if they would cease to raise up new armies on the land and new fleets on the sea-arming and equipping themselves for another war. I am opposed to the cancellation of another dollar of this indebtedness. If these nations are unwilling to pay, and choose to repudiate their sacred obligations, we will hardly go to war about it; but we shall profit, I hope, by our bitter experience, and keep our money at home in the future. We have been cursed with internationalism from the time of the World War. Entangling foreign alliances, the cancellation of foreign debts, and all sorts of compromising agreements touching our domestic policies have been preached for years by theoretical statesmen and selfish internationalists-bankers and others; and a vast amount of poison has thus entered into our political and financial systems. To other nations and peoples we have been generous without stint; yet to-day we are hated and denounced by most of those whom we have sought to help. This, too, in the hour of our greatest need. The net result is that the taxpayers of the United States of America, at the price of their impoverishment, are paying the cost of $75,000. This institution, located at Louisville, prints books us in some future conflict, largely arising—if it does arisefrom the fact that we have earned the hatred of those we have sought to serve. What a paradox! The easy way in which we as a nation have been "buncoed" in regard to these foreign loans might suggest that the name "Uncle Sam " should be changed to "Uncle Simple."

INTERNATIONAL BANKERS

Again the international bankers come into the picture. They have sold to our people vast totals of foreign bonds and securities—and domestic as well—that are absolutely worthless, and which they had every reason to believe were worthless. This they did for brokerage fees and commissions which were very large in their totals. These highfinance racketeers have thus written a most sordid, dastardly chapter in the country's financial history, and they have greatly contributed to the staggering depression which has come upon our people. It is a pity that these contemptible malefactors can not be brought to justice. Certainly the States and the Nation should enact all possible legislation to prevent the recurrence of such a situation.

ORGANIZED GROUPS AND MINORITIES

Organized groups and minorities have been too effective, by far, in their demands and exactions in State and Nation in recent years. Basic claims ofttimes just, too often have been expanded into injustice. These groups are articulate and active, whereas the masses are inarticulate and unorganized. The groups usually seek to punish those who do not go all the way with them, and the great body of taxpayers and voters are inclined to view with indifference and unconcern the punitive efforts of organized minorities. Too often it is that they join in these efforts. All this is calculated to have a demoralizing effect on those engaged in the public service; and it is generally recognized that those who are brave enough to stand by their convictions, by their judgment touching the welfare of the people as a whole, may ultimately fall victims of the wrath of selfishness and greed. This fact constitutes a vital defect in democracies, and it can be mitigated only through a better knowledge and understanding of public issues by the people, an improved spirit of patriotism, and the organization of the masses against the classes. Every legitimate interest or group has the right, of course, to have representation and to be heard; but too often the tendency is to exceed the limits of fair play and the consideration due others. What a pity it is that the great unorganized, inarticulate public has not capable and courageous nonoffice-holding representatives to combat the selfish propaganda and representations of special groups. It may be said, of course, that it is the business of legislative bodies and executive officials to see to it that no injustice is done. So it is, but all these governmental bodies and officials would be greatly helped in the performance of their tasks by such counteracting agencies in the matter of ascertainments of facts; and also greatly strengthened in their efforts to prevent the granting of undue or unjustified favors to organized minorities at the expense of the many.

PARTICULAR MEASURES, ETC.

Mr. Speaker, among the enactments, appropriations, and other results of a specific character, which I have been able to procure, or have been chiefly instrumental in procuring, since I have been a Member of the Congress, I may mention those that follow:

The act authorizing the establishment of the Mammoth Cave National Park in Kentucky.

Appropriation of $25,000 for making a topographic survey of the Mammoth Cave National Park area.

The act creating the Zachary Taylor National Cemetery in Jefferson County, Ky., and the procurement of appropriations of about $60,000 for permanent improvements therefor.

Appropriation of $35,000 for the construction of a new United States Coast Guard station on the Ohio River at Louisville.

The acts increasing the annual appropriation for the American Printing House for the Blind from $50,000 to for blind pupils in all the schools for the blind in the United States and Territories.

The act placing the storekeeper-gaugers, for years the "underdogs" of the Treasury Department, on a parity, as to salaries, all-time employment, and sick and annual leave, with all the other Treasury employees.

The act authorizing appropriations of $100,000 for the permanent and adequate improvement and protection of the Lincoln birthplace farm, in Larue County, Ky. The appropriations have been made, the improvements constructed, and this sacred and patriotic shrine—neglected for years—has been preserved and rendered available for all the people.

The act under which the new $5,000,000 municipal bridge has been constructed across the Ohio River at Louisville. This measure—the first of its kind, and now a model for numerous bridge acts under State and municipal sponsorship—permitted the city of Louisville to finance the project upon a pledge of operating tolls.

The authorization and appropriation of $2,895,000 for the purchase of a new site and the construction of a new Federal building in Louisville. The building—a very handsome and commodious one—has been completed and now houses all the Federal activities in Louisville—heretofore scattered—with the consequent rent saving to the United States Government of about $50,000 a year. In addition, the Government has the old Federal building and site which, under normal conditions, should bring $3,000,000, or more than enough to pay the cost of the new building and site. The total of appropriations made for the latter was not, in fact, actually used. A net saving to the Government should accordingly result. I had the honor to lay the cornerstone of the new structure and to deliver the formal address therefor on December 28, 1931. The building was completed and occupied in November, 1932.

The act providing for a system of refunds of taxes to tobacco manufacturers and dealers on account of tax-paid products which became damaged or unmarketable. This was a greatly needed and highly meritorious piece of legislation. The antikidnaping act for the District of Columbia.

The enactment of legislation and the procurement of appropriations of $1,250,000 for a new and much-needed veterans' hospital for Kentucky, located at Lexington, and which has been constructed, and for some time has been in operation.

Also, I procured the authorization of an appropriation of one-half million dollars for the construction of a new and greatly needed marine hospital at Louisville. This structure is now nearly completed and the Treasury Department has been able to build it for less than the appropriation authorized.

At the first session of the Seventy-second Congress I introduced a bill authorizing the construction of a new hospital at Fort Knox, Ky. Thereupon there was included in the emergency relief act an item of $200,000 for such construction, the appropriation was accordingly made, and the work of building the hospital is under way.

The War Department having determined to make Fort Knox a permanent Army post, as well as a summer training camp, this new hospital is a matter of necessity. For years I have urged the undoubted merits of Fort Knox as a regular, permanent Army post, and I am greatly gratified that official action to make it such a post has been taken, after full and careful study.

LEGISLATION AFFECTING PANAMA CANAL

I may also state that it has been my privilege to sponsor and bring about the enactment of certain important measures, now named, affecting the Isthmus of Panama and the Panama Canal.

The act creating the Gorgas memorial laboratory in Panama City, adjacent to the Canal Zone, and an annual appropriation from our Government of $50,000 for its maintenance and operation. The laboratory is functioning with great success as regards research into the causes and prevention of tropical diseases. It is fully justifying its establishment and is rapidly becoming one of the foremost institutions in the entire world.

The act authorizing the appropriation of $1,000,000 for the establishment of a permanent ferry across the Panama Canal at the Pacific entrance, for the construction of the required ferry vessels, and for the building of a roadway from the western terminus of the ferry to the boundary line between the Canal Zone and the Republic of Panama. The appropriations have been made and the entire ferry-road project has been completed and is in operation.

Also, I have been the House author of omnibus bridge legislation for Kentucky, under which the State's highway commission is constructing and operating much-needed bridges for the State.

PUBLIC-BUILDINGS PROGRAM

In addition it has been my privilege to assist in the procurement of appropriations for Federal and other buildings and sites in Kentucky, including the narcotic farm and hospital at Lexington. All these projects were carefully considered and approved by the administrative agencies of the Government; and all are highly meritorious. During my 10 years of service here I have been a member of the subcommittee which, for the Appropriations Committee, has been charged with the duty of conducting the hearings upon and formulating the annual Treasury-Post Office Department appropriation bills. I have thus been in position to learn in an intimate way of the public-building needs of the country, as these bills carry appropriations therefor. Thus far we have pursued a scientific and non-pork-barrel method of dealing with this important subject. This has been under the basic act passed by the Congress a few years ago, whereby the Treasury Department, upon surveys and studies, makes recommendations for building projects. Since that law was passed our subcommittee has approved no appropriations for new building projects not recommended by the Treasury Department.

OTHER MATTERS

Further, I may suggest that some years ago I took the lead in the successful effort to establish some greatly needed branch offices of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce; among them, one at Louisville. These offices have fully proven their value, especially during this economic crisis when our manufacturers and producers need and are looking for foreign markets.

It was also my privilege to take a leading part in bringing about the establishment of the air mail service from Cleveland via Cincinnati, Louisville, Nashville, Memphis, and Little Rock to Dallas and Fort Worth, and the lighting of the route. This enterprise was and is a very popular one, and over this airway there is now being successfully operated a night-and-day service through and over a vast portion of the country. No section is more entitled to such service than is this one.

The Eastern National Park-to-Park Highway has been established under my initiation and sponsorship, and I have the honor to be the president of the Eastern National Park-to-Park Association. This great thoroughfare connects and ties together, by a 2,000-mile hard-surfaced road system, the Mammoth Cave National Park in Kentucky; the Great Smoky Mountains National Park in North Carolina and Tennessee; the Shenandoah National Park in Virginia; Washington, D. C.; the national monument at Wakefield and that at Yorktown; Jamestown (the first settlement), Richmond, and Appomattox, Va.; together with other points of outstanding scenic and historic interest. The value of this project now and through the years to come must be obvious.

My interest in National and State parks and in recreational areas has always been of the keenest character; and since I have been a Member of the Congress I have been very happy to utilize the opportunity thus afforded to aid in the national park and monument work, and especially in that work as regards the creation of a system—greatly needed—of national parks east of the Mississippi River.

It may be recalled, also, that chiefly through my efforts and representations one of our new 10,000-ton cruisers was christened Louisville for my home city, Kentucky's metropolis.

The States to the southward have not fared as well in the | past as those to the northward and eastward. In cases where the conditions have seemed to justify or warrant it, I have felt that I should press the claims of my own State. Too long has it seemed to me that Kentucky, which from colonial days has done so much for the common country in blood, in talent, and in treasure, has been neglected in its legitimate needs at the hands of the Federal Government. No State in the entire Union is richer in historic, romantic, and scenic interest than is that of the "dark and bloody ground," and I am most grateful that during my period of service here I have been able in a small way to do something in her behalf.

Upon my retirement from Congress I trust that this general statement bearing on my stewardship may not be deemed inappropriate. I have been very happy always to serve my State and my district; happy always, also, to serve my country and its every section. All this I have sought to do unselfishly and with due regard to every consideration involved.

THE BIRTHPLACE OF THE REPUBLIC

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Record, I include the following address delivered by me at the New York State Washington bicentennial celebration held at Temple Hill, town of New Windsor, Orange County, N. Y., Saturday, May 28, 1932:

It is right and fitting that the George Washington bicentennial celebration should be held at Temple Hill, hallowed by the presence, during the Revolutionary War, of the Commander in Chief and the Continental Army and made sacred by the events that took place here.

This site should indeed be a national shrine, for it was here at Temple Hill, New Windsor, that George Washington delivered the first law-and-order speech, after victory had been secured, before a convention of officers presided over by General Gates, and prevented his officers, by his wise advice and sagacious leadership, from open rebellion against Congress and the existing Government. Within sight of this spot stood row on row of the stone huts used during the last three winters by the Continental Army for winter quarters.

The famous headquarters of General Knox, still standing, is only a short way off. Valley Forge is better known in history, but Washington's army only spent one winter there; and Morristown, because it has been better advertised, is still considered by the American public to have been the main winter headquarters, which is very far from a historical fact.

Newburgh and New Windsor constituted the main camping grounds of the Revolutionary troops and was much more important, owing to the far-reaching events that occurred there, than Valley Forge or Morristown combined.

REMEDY HISTORICAL INJUSTICE

REMEDY HISTORICAL INJUSTICE

It is fair and proper that on this occasion we should at least try to remedy the historical injustice that has been committed against the State of New York and more particularly against Newburgh, New Windsor, and this section of the Hudson River known as the Highlands by the distinguished historians of the Revolutionary War, most of whom hailed, unfortunately, from New England and wrote from the point of view of Bunker Hill, Lexington, Concord, and the Boston Tea Party.

The decisive part played by New York State was almost completely overlooked, and the fact that the main strategy of the British, who had their headquarters at New York City for seven years, was to secure the forts in the Highlands and gain control of the Hudson River, thereby connecting up with the loyal forces in Canada and cutting the communication between the New England States and the central and southern States, was ignored.

land States and the central and southern States, was ignored.

It was likewise the main strategy of Washington during the greater part of the war to maintain the control of the Hudson by defending at all cost the forts in the Highlands. West Point, with its series of fortifications which were erected in the early part of 1778 and dominated the Hudson River, was never attacked because of its great strength.

cause of its great strength.

Of the 308 battles, large and small, in the Revolutionary War, 92 were fought in New York State, including the decisive battle of Saratoga. George Washington spent over 1,000 days during the war within a radius of 25 miles of this very spot. George Clinton, who was our first governor and served for 20 years as the chief executive of New York State, was born within a few miles from here, as was his brother, James Clinton.

It is well to remember on anniversaries of this nature that, in spite of the oblivion cast upon the participation of New York State in the Revolutionary War, we gave to the cause of liberty and independence the Clintons, Livingstons, Gouverneur and Lewis Morris, Alexander Hamilton, John Jay, and Generals McDougal, Scott, Montgomery, and Herkimer, of whom the two latter were killed in battle.

killed in battle.

SETTLED FORM OF GOVERNMENT

Former Senator Henry Cabot Lodge, in his History of the American Revolution, does not even refer to Newburgh and New Windsor, where two of the most vital events in the early history of our country took place. It was from his headquarters at Newburgh, on May 22, 1782, that General Washington wrote his famous letter of rebuke to Colonel Nicola and a group of fellow officers who virtually offered him a crown, and thereby determined once and for all the establishment of our republican form of

The following is a quotation from Washington's letter to Colonel Nicola: "Let me conjure you, then, if you have any regard for your country, concern for yourself or posterity, or respect for me, to banish these thoughts from your mind and never communicate as from yourself, or anyone else, a sentiment of like nature."

For some reason that I do not understand efforts have been made to make it appear that Temple Hill was connected with this important episode in the formation of the Republic. Such is not the case, nor is there any need to attempt to add new laurels to this sacred spot, which was the camping ground of the Revolution, and made even more famous by the remarkable address of General Washington to his officers in the new building or temple of General Washington to his omcers in the new bulling of semple on this very spot.

After the Battle of Yorktown there was much dissatisfaction among many of the officers who had not received their pay for a long time and the resentment against the Congress for giving nothing but empty promises to the officers who were about to be discharged resulted in a conspiracy among them to resort to force and violence. Anonymous addresses were circulated and threats made and meetings arranged. The Commander in Chief, when he was notified of the situation, anticipated the conspirators by calling all the officers of the Army who were present to meet him at and adjusted them, and remarked simply: "These eyes, my friends, have grown dim and these locks white in the service, yet I have never doubted the justice of my country." never doubted the justice of my country."

WINS OVER OFFICERS

He then went on to deliver as sublime a speech as there is in American history, and by his common sense and moderation to completely win over his officers to a course of action based upon reason and military discipline. I have quoted at some length from this speech, first because it was delivered on this site, and, secondly, because it shows the greatness of Washington's character, and, thirdly, because it determined that these United States were not to become a military autocracy. Amid the most profound attention he commenced reading:

"Gentlemen by an approximate summers an attenut her hear

"Gentlemen, by an anonymous summons an attempt has been made to convene you together—how inconsistent with rules of made to convene you together—now inconsistent with fules of propriety, how unmilitary, how subversive of all order and discipline, let the good sense of the Army decide."

The Commander in Chief then pointed out the dreadful consequences of following the advice of the anonymous writer—subsequently ascertained to be Major Armstrong (afterwards Secretary of War)—"either to draw their swords against their country or retire it was continues from the defense of all they hold deer." retire, if war continues, from the defense of all they hold dear," and concluded with the following forcible percration:

"I conjure you, in the name of our common country, as you value your own sacred honor, as you respect the rights of hu-manity, to express your utmost horror and detestation of the man who wishes, under any specious pretenses, to overturn the liberties of your country and who wickedly attempts to open the floodgates of civil discord and deluge our rising empire in blood."

The convention resolved unanimously, among other things, that the Army have unshaken confidence in Congress and view with abhorrence and reject with disdain the infamous proposition contained in a late anonymous address to officers of the Army

This address of Washington upholding military discipline and our existing civil government was not only the first law-and-order speech which has become so common to-day, but had a far-reaching effect on maintaining intact the fruits of victory already won after seven long years of deprivations and warfare.

LETTER TO GOVERNORS

It is well to remember in this connection that General Washington wrote his well-known letter of congratulations and advice to the governors of the thirteen States from his Newburgh headquar-the governors of the thirteen States from his Newburgh headquarters on June 8, 1783, in which, among other suggestions, he advocated the building up of a citizens' army or militia. The following is an extract from this letter of advice:

"The militia of this country must be considered as the palladium of our security, and the first effectual resort in case of hostility; it is essential, therefore, that the same system should pervade the whole; that the formation and discipline of the militia of the continent should be absolutely uniform; and the same species of arms, accouterments, and military apparatus should be introduced in every part of the United States. No one who has not learned it from experience can conceive the difficulty. who has not learned it from experience can conceive the difficulty, expense, and confusion which result from a contrary system or the vague arrangements which have hitherto prevailed."

This is practically our system of national defense to-day, in which the National Guard, Officers' Reserve Corps, Reserve Officers' which the National Guard, Officers Reserve Corps, Reserve Officers Training Corps, and citizens' military training camps constitute a trained reserve for our small and efficient Regular Army. It is truly a democratic, American system of national defense and, besides, is voluntary and the least costly.

I congratulate the people of this district on having in their midst at West Point the greatest and most efficient military academy not only in the United States but throughout the world.

We are proud of it and its glorious traditions, and we appreciate the participation of the cadet corps and its distinguished superintendent, Maj. Gen. William D. Connor, in these ceremonies.

The people of Newburgh and vicinity are also proud of the splendid record of the One hundred and fifty-sixth Regiment of Field Artillery, largely officered by World War veterans who served with valor and distinction on the battlefields of France.

We are proud of that fine military academy at Cornwall, the best institution of its kind in the country, and we are grateful to all the fraternal, civic, veteran, and patriotic groups who have participated in these ceremonies and made this celebration the largest and most important held in this section of the State of New York and most important held in this section of the State of New York for the past 50 years.

SEEKS NATIONAL PARK

I am hopeful, when more prosperous times return, that the Congress will consider favorably the plan to erect a small national park at Temple Hill, including the sites of the old winter quarters of our Revolutionary soldiers. This whole section is truly the cradle of the Republic, and we would be failing in our duty to the memories of those who served here for so many years in defense of our country at its birth if we did not do our share to keep alive their sacrifices in order that we might be a free and independent people.

pendent people.

The Declaration of Independence, written by the immortal Thomas Jefferson, was a mere scrap of paper until, through the courage, leadership, determination, and faith of George Washington, it was translated into a political actuality—the Government of the United States.

More than anything else to-day in solving our acute economic and political problems is the need of the same high degree of courage, leadership, determination, and faith as shown by George Washington throughout seven long years of the Revolutionary War, and here at Temple Hill, when by a few words he quelled mutiny among his officers.

among his officers.

We are, it is true, in the midst of a serious economic crisis, but there can be no question that the American people will emerge from this depression as long as they and their leaders adhere to those same principles that guided George Washington to final victory during the Revolutionary War.

Our republican form of government is still the hope and aspiration of the struggling masses of mankind throughout the world, whether they be in Italy, Russia, China, or Japan.

Let us, on this two hundredth anniversary of the birth of the Father of Our Country, rededicate ourselves to the proposition that a government of the people, by the people, and for the people shall not perish from this earth.

Let us reaffirm our belief in our republican form of government, because it is the soundest, fairest, wisest, most honorable, and best ever devised by the mind of man.

Let us cherish it and defend it against all of its enemies, both from without and from within, and serve notice upon all socialists, from without and from within, and serve notice upon all socialists, pink intellectuals, communists, and fascists, and those advocating some temporary foreign dictatorship, that we have faith in America and believe that our republican form of government is still the

RECESS

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House now stand in recess until 10 o'clock to-morrow.

GUESTS OF THE SENATE

The Members of the House of Representatives entered and were announced by Secretary Loeffler.

The Diplomatic Corps entered and were announced by Secretary Halsey.

The members of the President's Cabinet entered and were announced by Assistant Secretary Biffle.

The Chief of Staff of the Army, the Chief of Naval Operations, the Major Commandant of the Marine Corps, and their aides entered and were announced by Assistant Secretary Biffle.

The Chief Justice of the United States and the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States were announced. All the invited guests having been escorted to the seats provided for them, the secretary to the majority, Carl A. Loffler, announced John N. Garner, of Texas, the Vice President elect, accompanied by the chairman and members of the Joint Committee on Arrangements, consisting of Senator Joseph T. Robinson, Senator George H. Moses, Senator Frederick Hale, Representative Bertrand H. Snell, Representative Henry T. Rainey, and Representative Edward W. Pou.

Several minutes before noon the Deputy Sergeant at Arms, J. Mark Trice, announced the President of the United States, accompanied by the chairman and members of the Joint Committee on Arrangements. The President of the United States was seated in the area in front of the Secretary's desk.

The secretary to the minority, Edwin A. Halsey, then announced Franklin D. Roosevelt, of New York, President elect of the United States, accompanied by the chairman and members of the Joint Committee on Arrangements. The President elect was seated on the right of the President of the United States, the chairman and members of the Joint Committee on Arrangements occupying the seats on either side.

Vice President Curtis administered the oath of office prescribed by law to Vice President-elect Garner, and then Mr. Curtis addressed the Senate as follows:

Senators, in my capacity as President of the Senate, and on behalf of the Members of the United States Senate, I extend greetings to the President of the United States and to our distinguished guests who are here to attend these historic ceremonies. They are a necessary part of this scene which is reenacted every four years in the United States Senate. On this particular occasion we are accomplishing the accession to office of a new President of the United States and marking the beginning of a period of control in the affairs of the Nation by the Democratic Party.

The major task confronting the new administration is to bring about the economic recovery of our people and of their affairs. Theirs is now the responsibility of leadership, but the problem is the concern of each and every one of us, whether retiring from office or entering office. I know the new administration will do everything in its power to bring about the desired result. I sincerely wish success to President-elect Roosevelt, to Vice President-elect Garner, and to the Democratic majority in Congress. In a few minutes they will assume the leadership in the difficult task confronting the Nation. The duties and responsibilities of their high offices are great. Our new leaders are entitled to, and I am sure they will receive, the full cooperation of everyone, for the common good of all.

To me personally this is one of the most important days | H. R. 4368. A of my life. It marks my leave-taking as your Presiding | W. McDonald.

gress, where I have been present as Vice President of the United States, as Senator, and as Congressman for 40 years. For four decades my life has been devoted to the task of aiding in the government of the United States. Two score years of my life have been spent in this building in which we are gathered. My work has been absorbing. It has fixed and held my best efforts for the public welfare. It is with deep emotion that I bid you good-by and shortly go forth from here a private citizen. It is with sincere regret that I bid farewell to this legislative atmosphere, to these kindly and friendly legislators with whom it has been my good fortune to associate for so many years. I need not tell you that in my long service in the House, in the Senate, and more recently as your Presiding Officer I have seen many such occasions as this, wherein the ties which bind us to our associates are broken. My turn was inevitable, of course, but I am thankful it was a long time coming. As I look over the personnel of the present House and Senate, I find not one Member of the House and only one Member of the Senate who then was a Congressman who was in the House when I was sworn in as a Member of that body in August, 1893. I find there is but one Senator, a Member of this body now, who was a Senator when I took the oath of office as Senator in January, 1907. I shall always cherish the memory of my days as a legislator. All of it has become an intimate part of my life; it is almost my very life itself.

I am under many and great obligations to you gentlemen of the Senate for your kindness to me. To your assistance and loyal support I am indebted for whatever measure of success I may have achieved as your Presiding Officer. It is with gratitude also that I acknowledge my indebtedness for the valuable support and assistance which I have always received from the officers of the Senate, from the efficient men at the desk, from the experts who are the official reporters, and from the bright and ever-alert pages. And I must not forget to mention those who have assisted me greatly and with such unselfish and untiring devotion in my office in the Senate Office Building—my staff there has been with me for many years. The members have worked diligently and well for me in my efforts for the common good. I thank them too.

Before closing I wish to say to Vice President-elect Garner that I can assure him that the Senators will support him in every way and will accept cheerfully and without complaint all his rulings as their Presiding Officer which are fair and impartial, and this no matter how it affects them personally. I offer my best wishes to Mr. Garner for success in the chair he is about to assume.

And now, with a last expression of thanks and good wishes to all of you and a last assurance of my conviction that the new administration will do everything in its power to relieve the distress now existing among so many of our people, I declare the Senate of the Seventy-second Congress of the United States adjourned sine die.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 14364, the District of Columbia appropriation bill, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the title, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 14643) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities, chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?
Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that it is to the best interest of the people of the United States that we do not pass this bill. On account of all that this Government has done for the people of the District of Columbia, I do not believe that the people of the States should contribute one dollar toward the civic expenses of Washington people. Our people at home have their own taxes to pay and should not be required to pay part of the local taxes here.

Our committee, however, headed by its able chairman, my distinguished friend from Missouri [Mr. Cannon], proposed to contribute the huge sum of $6,500,000 from the Federal Treasury to the District of Columbia in order to pass the bill. When this bill went to the Senate, it was there amended, 174 costly amendments being added to it, and one of such amendments added $3,000,000 to said contribution, requiring the sum of $9,500,000 to be taken out of the Federal Treasury and given to the District of Co-

We were told by the conferees of the Senate, after we had worked for two hours trying to reach an agreement, that if we insisted on the amount proposed in the House bill they would kill this bill, which forced the conference to an end. Then there were a star-chamber conference and agreement, and report, but when we fairly and fully presented this matter to the House last night by a decisive vote of only 14 ayes to 102 noes, the star-chamber conference report was voted down by the House.

By letting this bill die and repassing it in proper form in the new Congress, which convenes next week, we can save for the taxpayers back home enough money on this one bill alone to pay the salaries of all Congressmen for a whole year, and at the same time do justice to and save money for the people of Washington. And it is worth while to save this money.

For the above reasons, Mr. Speaker, I object to the unanimous-consent request, and we will let this bill die for this

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, as I understand the situation, Members have five days to extend their remarks in the

The SPEAKER. The Journal shows that each Member has five days to extend his own remarks.

Does the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. Howard] desire to be recognized?

Mr. HOWARD. What does the Chair want me to do? The SPEAKER. The Chair noticed the gentleman standing and thought that he desired recognition.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I will say that I have always tried to be an upstanding Member ever since I came here. [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, I must speak in tones of mingled joy and sadness at this moment. I want to speak with particular reference to one Member of this House. There have been many beautiful characters here, to whom I have learned to feel very near. I want to speak particularly with reference to one who, in my judgment, has been in many directions the most remarkable Member of the House of Representatives during all my service.

During the past several years we have had here in this House a quiet organization. It had no roster of members, it had no officers except those who were just naturally recognized as its officers. I speak of our so-called group of progressive Democrats and progressive Republicans. Two or three times a week during all of the years we have been in the habit of holding little conferences, and always, during those conferences, intuitively we have looked upon one m a as our uncrowned chairman. That one man by common consent was the gentleman from New York [Mr. LaGumpia]. [Applause.] I believe I am correct when I say that during all of my service here no organization of common thought-and that was the only object of our progressive organization—to get men of common thought together—has ever succeeded in carrying more of its thoughts into legislation than this so-called group of progressive Democrats and progressive Republicans. I do not mean it has been successful in carrying to the book many statutes, but it has been magnificently successful in preventing much legislation which the combined thought of this group felt would not be good for the country. I do not have voice this morning, although I have desire, to pay that mede of tribute that ought to be paid in the name of this group of progressive Democrats and progressive Republicans to Mr. LaGuardia. He has been so intrepid in his leadership, he has been so honest, he has been so faithful on the floor in guiding every piece of legislation into the line of principle so far as he could, held, entertained, and fought for by his progressive group, that any words I might utter in his praise would be inadequate. I do not know how it could be possible for a constituency in his own country to refuse him a reelection.

I say to you men who come from the farm States if you will look at the record for the past two or three years while we have been clamoring for legislation in behalf of agriculture you will know that this man LaGuardia, coming from a district in the greatest city in our country and in the world, has been the best friend of the cause of agriculture, day after day, among all of us. He takes the scientific and the right position, representing a district largely composed of working people, that there can be no good thing in a legislative way for his people which does not carry a fair legislative recognition of the rights of agriculture.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes.
Mr. BLANTON. To epitomize it in one sentence, Fiorello H. LAGUARDIA is one of the most valuable men in the House.

Mr. HOWARD. I think so, beyond any question. I have talked with many of my fellows who were sometimes just a little piqued, sometimes just a little angry, but never incensed, toward LaGuardia, and in the name of all those with whom I have talked I express to him our heartfelt regret that he is not to be with us during the next session and my earnest hope that some day he will come back to us again. [Applause.] I do not care whether he shall come back to us as a Republican or as a Tammany brave or as an independent. I want LaGuardia back here again. [Ap-

Mr. BLANTON. LAGUARDIA is sure to come back. Nothing can keep him away. Notwithstanding that we differ fundamentally on some questions, I am his personal friend and have the highest regard for him. May good luck attend him until he comes back.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, in these closing hours of the Seventy-second Congress I arise to pay tribute to two of our Membership who after years of conscientious and faithful service are temporarily leaving us. FRED PURNELL, of Indiana, and EARL C. MICHENER, of Michigan, are strong in the Republican faith, and yet I know there is genuine regret on both sides of the House that the vicissitudes of politics have caused the public service to lose these two men. They were Republicans, and yet above all, they were Americans; and the splendid service which they have rendered to their country will never be forgotten by those who have been associated with them.

FRED PURNELL first came to Congress with the Sixty-fifth Congress. Representing a farming district, he was assigned to the Committee on Agriculture. In the last decade no more important problem has been before the Congress than that which concerned the relief of millions of our countrymen. Mr. PURNELL, through his intimate knowledge of agricultural life, has been able to perform remarkable service to his own people and to the country.

His ability was quickly recognized by the leadership of the House, and he was given a place on the Rules Committee, where he steadily gained in rank until he became the ranking Republican member.

EARL C. MICHENER entered upon his congressional career with the Sixty-sixth Congress. Coming to the House with a fine reputation won in the field of law, it was natural he would be assigned to the great Committee on the Judiciary. Nearly all of the larger measures which came from this committee had the benefit of his keen legal mind. Later he was named to the Rules Committee, as well as retaining his place on Judiciary. His second assignment gave him an unusual opportunity for usefulness, and his able and efficient service gained for him an outstanding position in the House.

Both Mr. Purnell and Mr. Michener had won for themselves a secure place in the leadership of the House. Both have been tireless workers, men of unusual ability, possessing a wide grasp upon public affairs, and men with the courage of their convictions.

Their going will bring universal regret, particularly as they leave at a time when the country needs strong men in positions of leadership. The keenness of our regret is softened by the belief it is only a temporary departure and within a short time we will be welcoming them back. I am sure I voice the unanimous feeling of the House when I wish them the fullest measure of happiness and prosperity in the years which are to come. [Applause.]

TITLE TO CERTAIN LANDS IN LOS ANGELES COUNTY, CALIF.

Mr. EVANS of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 637) to relinquish the title of the United States to certain lands in the county of Los Angeles, State of California, with a Senate amendment thereto, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 9, strike out "granted, released" and insert "released."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was concurred in.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, in this hour of tender sentiment, when the spirit of generosity and kindness seems to permeate the Chamber, I think I shall reach the height of generosity and kindness that is ever attained in this Chamber when I undertake to say a few kind and complimentary words, not about any of our colleagues here, but, perchance, about two gentlemen in another body of this Capitol. When we are moved in the hall of this House to speak kindly of another body, I submit that that is a sign that our hearts are being mellowed and our spirits are touched with sentiment. Seriously for a moment, if I may, I hope I may say with pardonable pride that my native, beloved State, the ancient Commonwealth of Virginia, which has been denominated the mother of States and of statesmen, occupies a unique position to-day in the catalogue of the Nation's Commonwealths.

When our President elect engaged upon the momentous task of selecting his advisers to his Cabinet, may it be said as a distinct compliment to the representatives of the State of Virginia in the United States Senate that each of our great Senators was seriously under consideration for a place at the Cabinet table of President Roosevelt. When the gavel falls to-day at 12 noon in the Senate, there will go out of that body one of the most colorful, one of the most attractive, and one of the most useful men that have been in the public service in this Nation in the present generation, Senator Claude A. Swanson, of Virginia. [Applause.]

Senator Swanson had his early training in this body. He applied himself as a young man to the tasks of national legislation. From here he went to serve his native State with honor and capacity as her chief executive, and, since the Fifty-third Congress, he has served in the Senate of the United States. To-day he goes from that body to the post of Secretary of the Navy in the Cabinet of President Roosevelt. It was a most happy choice. Because of his long service on the Naval Affairs Committee, his thorough understanding of foreign affairs and the problems of diplomacy, Senator Swanson will grace that place and be a useful adviser to the President.

When the subject of banking and finance is mentioned, inevitably we think of the name of CARTER GLASS, of Virginia. In this hour of national crisis, when the question of a sound and unabased currency is so vital to the welfare of the Nation, I am sure the people of the United States rest with a great deal of security in knowing that in another body the now senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. Glass] will be there to protect their interests. Senator Glass might have been Secretary of the Treasury; but feeling that his greatest place of service was in the Senate of the United States, where, as an authority on banking and finance, he is without a peer, he very properly, in my judgment, made a decision to remain there.

To take the place of Senator Swanson in the United States Senate, Virginia to-day will send one of her most gifted and talented sons, HARRY FLOOD BYRD, of Virginia. Governor Byrn caught the imagination and won the applause of the people of America, as well as of his own State, when, because of his genius for government, he took the fiscal and financial affairs of the State of Virginia, balanced her budget, reorganized her executive departments, and put the old State in a class by herself because of those facts. He comes into the United States Senate to-day at a time when there is uppermost in the minds of the people the question of Government reorganization and finance, and I know of no man better equipped temperamentally and from experience to give of his vast knowledge and his splendid attainments in attempting to solve the great problems of Government reorganization and finance.

So I say, my colleagues, that I hope I may be pardoned if to-day I call your attention to the fact that, as in all times past, whenever a great crisis faced this Nation, old Virginia, the ancient and classic Commonwealth, mother of States and statesmen, is ready to make her contribution to the public welfare. [Applause.]

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for a few minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, it had not been my intention, before the closing hours of the Seventy-second Congress, to engage in one of the valedictory or farewell speeches that have been so freely engaged in upon the floor within the last few hours; but inasmuch as it became apparent that we had to mark time in the House for an hour or so, and in order that we may not have to take a recess for that purpose, I have felt an impulse to address just a few remarks to my colleagues before final adjournment.

I have no message to present to you. I do not expect, by these few remarks, to contribute anything toward a solution of any of our legislative problems that are now pressing down upon us with such imperious necessity. But in the closing hours of the Congress we are all touched by certain sentimental reactions that do credit to our natures.

Gentlemen who have preceded me have already paid tribute to many of the distinguished and able retiring Members on the minority side. I could not expect to add anything to those generous contributions of praise of those gentlemen, but I wish to say with reference to the men on the minority side who will abide with us in the next Congress I have been profoundly touched and reassured from the standpoint of the best interests of the country, by private assurances that have been given to me, not for publication but purely as matters of personal expression from men on the Republican side of this House who will be dominant in its policies and in its actions in the next session of Congress, who have expressed the universal sentiment that although they expect to take advantage of every legitimate mistake of policy or of action that the Democrats in control of the Government may make, although they will reserve to themselves the privilege and opportunity of undertaking to rebuild their party in the confidence and esteem of the country in the next two years, nevertheless they are so profoundly impressed with the exigencies that lie upon the fortunes of the country to-day that they do not propose captiously to interpose purely partisan objections to the policies of the new administration.

I see the distinguished leader of the minority in the next Congress nod his head in approval at that suggestion. I trust that within the next two years we will not have occasion to remind him of any breach of faith along those lines, as I am sure we will not.

Since the Confederate forces fired on Fort Sumter on the 12th day of April, 1861, and started a great sectional war which should never have been fought, we have never faced such a crisis as we are facing at this time. It has always been my opinion, southerner as I am to the core, the son of a Confederate soldier who fought for four long years as a captain in the Confederate service and who bore to his grave the scars of four desperate wounds received upon the field of action, that that war was very largely precipitated by the politicians of the country and not by the people of either of the contending factions.

But since that conflict began, in my opinion, the Government of the United States, as far as its political integrity is concerned and as far as its fundamental existence goes, during these 72 years has not been confronted with national emergencies more grave in their possibilities than those which now confront the new administration and the new Congress of the United States.

Gentlemen, the main purpose that I have in mind this morning in the closing hours of this session is to make an appeal to the American people, some of whose representatives honor us this morning by attendance in the galleries as our guests, not only those who are here, but the vast multitudes and the vast millions of the American people who are looking to this Capitol and to yonder White House for wise, sane, substantial, remedial legislation, to still have faith in the Congress of the United States and their Representatives. [Applause.]

Can they not well understand how perplexing are our problems? If 1 of them, even the wisest 12 of them, or 50 of them, were invited to sit around the table to-day under this Capitol and write out definite programs of recovery, do you not imagine that they would break up after their sessions in difficulties, amazements, and disputes as to the wise thing for us to do?

This is in the nature of a personal experience, but I hope you will pardon the reference: I was traveling to Alabama the other day on a personal mission, and, sitting in the smoking room of the sleeping car, without disclosing my identity to the gentlemen there present or letting them know that I was a Member of Congress, I engaged in conversation with five unusually intelligent men, men of substance, evidently men who from their statements were men of position, men of experience in business affairs, men who have been studying some of these public questions. I undertook in turn to interrogate them as to their suggestions about what the Congress of the United States should do to meet this problem. Their suggestions covered the question of silver, the question of inflation, the question of foreign debts, the question of the security of our national banking system, the question of agricultural relief. All five of them had different panaceas, and they differed just as seriously in their conclusions as we do here on some of these

Therefore I hope the people will hear the humble voice of the representative of an agricultural constituency down in Alabama and heed this appeal that the American people cease to criticize and to lampoon and even to degrade and bring into disrepute the Congress of the United States and their own representatives here in this Chamber. Give us a decent, fighting chance by concert of action upon the part of both this and the other branch of Congress; give us a reasonable and fair opportunity to meet, to measure, and to master if we can these terrible problems that now confront us. I say it is a desperate time. It is a time that challenges the finest capacity of every legislator in the Congress of the United States, but I have faith. I know that we still have our great natural resources, our fertile fields, our waterways, our mines, our forests, our factories, and, above all, millions of American people patriotic and patient who are anxious to take advantage of these resources and rebuild our industrial and agricultural prosperity.

So, Mr. Speaker, as in times of former economic national emergencies great leaders have emerged to lead our people out of confusion and chaos into the sunlight of prosperity and peace, so, now, I have faith that leaders will rise to meet this emergency. Then, in the spirit of a common appeal let us this morning just before the hour of our adjournment, call back into the presence of this Chamber, and the one at the other end of the Capitol, and the Executive Mansion yonder, the memory of the services of men like Jefferson, Jackson, Cleveland, Roosevelt, Wilson, and Abraham Lincoln. Let the spirit of those men come back, if such things are possible, to reinspire and give new comfort to our people.

I am going to venture to do something else here this morning. I trust that in doing so in closing I will not offend any of the proprieties that ought to obtain in a temporal forum, but knowing you men as I have known you through all these long years of service, I feel that deep down in the hearts and bosoms of most of the men who sit before me here this morning lie dormant deep spiritual and religious convictions; and in a time like this, in a time when we stand almost within the shadow of desperation if not dissolution, as in the days of old; should we be ashamed to invoke in our deliberation and in our service here the aid and assistance of a higher power?

I want the people of America to remember their traditions. I am sure they still believe in the integrity and the soundness of our Federal Government. Let us as their representatives, those of us who stay here, as well as those who go away, carry to the people the message I am trying to suggest this morning. Let all of us, in the fear of God, undertake to rededicate our best services to our country and to our people.

I believe that the time is not far away when we will begin to see the sunshine break through the clouds and that by the inherent genius of the people of America and her statesmen we will see the hour beginning to approach when there will be given back to us "the upward look and the light," and when in the hearts and homes of our people there will be reestablished "the music and the dream."

I thank you very much. [Applause.]

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, in the closing hours of this Congress I feel an impulse to address the House briefly, speaking generally and not addressing my remarks to any particular subject.

I believe that the old declaration, "Be not deceived, God is not mocked, for whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap," is good law to-day.

As we approach the close of this session of the Congress, realizing that within a few moments it shall have expired and the acts of the Membership of this House shall become history for all time to come, I am impelled to a discussion of some of the principles of ethics applicable to business and business conditions of this day and of this age.

More than 100 years ago, over in the valley of Virginia, there developed a school of statesmanship that founded and inaugurated this great system of government under which we live, and I rise to-day, Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of saying to my colleagues upon the floor of this House that I have no patience with the idea frequently expressed that the Government of the United States is liable to fail. I can not help recalling the historic statement of Georges Clemenceau, of France, who visited this country in 1876 and wrote upon many great subjects. Clemenceau laid down the doctrine and belief that the American people, with a democratic form of government, would sometimes go wrong, but, ultimately, they would find a Moses to lead them from the paths of wrong back into the paths of justice, wisdom, and duty.

I am discouraged, of course, with the conditions that exist in America to-day, but I have not seen the hour, I never expect to see the hour, when I shall lose faith in the American people, and they are the ones upon whom rest the principles and the success of a free government.

Oh, they say we are going to have a change and a new bassador to France or President of the United States, but deal, and I believe as firmly as I believe I am standing upon it was Jefferson's great pride that he was the author of the the floor of this House to-day that with the noon hour today there shall be ushered in for leadership in this great Government a new Moses, who will lead us from the bondage of Egypt, out of the wilderness, into the promised land of a great era, if we will but follow.

Oh, they say this can not be done; that crashing calamity is ahead; but do you realize that history tells us the children of Israel, who were captured and placed in Babylonian captivity, after a sojourn there returned victorious and triumphant and then built above the ashes of defeat an altar at which they knelt and worshipped and around which they rebuilt the temple? To-day in America the American people, not the Democratic Party alone, not our leader, Franklin D. Roosevelt, alone, not any political party, but the great masses of the American people have determined that there shall be a coming back to the altar and to the fundamentals of the Constitution of the United States. They have ushered in a new administration of the Government, and if we measure up to our responsibilities all will be well.

Oh, it was the founder of the Democratic Party, the immortal Jefferson, who laid down the fundamental principle that the Government was established, not for the few but established upon the doctrine of "equal and exact justice to all men and exclusive privileges to none." It was Jefferson who enunciated the doctrine that the Government had been instituted for the protection of life, liberty, and property, and upon this he erected the great Democratic slogan of "equal and exact justice to all men and exclusive privileges to none."

I say to you to-day that when the Government of the United States returns to these fundamental principles we will come again to the days of Andrew Jackson and Thomas Jefferson and Woodrow Wilson and Grover Cleveland; and, oh, when I think of the great fundamentals laid down by Jefferson and the doctrines of government that he promulgated, that all its just powers are derived from the consent of the governed, I believe that to-day the four great shining lights in American history are Thomas Jefferson, Andrew Jackson, Grover Cleveland, and Woodrow Wilson. [Applause.]

For a time just prior to the great stock-market crash of 1929, that brought upon our country financial wreck and ruin and carried down with it the fortunes of multiplied millions of our people, greed had ridden to the market places and sat enthroned as the sole dictator of all our financial policies, and thus the gods of organized greed have wrought. Then in the years that have followed that great financial catastrophe, greed has surrendered in a measure to the iniquitous and disastrous god of fear. The recent disclosures of graft and petty greed that have characterized the conduct of some of our great financial institutions, such as characterized the management of one great New York City bank as disclosed in a recent investigation at the other end of the Capitol, is not in line with Jefferson's teachings that "honesty is the best course to pursue." They need not deceive themselves-

For whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap. For he that soweth to his flesh shall of the flesh reap corruption; but he that soweth to the Spirit shall of the Spirit reap life everlasting.

These high financiers have sown to the wind, and now they are reaping the whirlwind. They are reaping what they have sown; and, if the Department of Justice will exert itself in the right direction and see that the law is enforced and a few crooks are put behind iron bars for perjury and theft, that will be a master stroke in giving effect to the century-old Democratic doctrine of "equal and exact justice to all men and exclusive privileges to none." The individuals responsible for such conduct ought to be reminded of the command of Holy Writ, "Thou shalt not steal."

Thomas Jefferson never boasted of the fact that he was a great engineer and a great architect or that he was ambassador to France or President of the United States, but it was Jefferson's great pride that he was the author of the Declaration of Independence, the founder of the University of Virginia, and the writer of the Virginia statutes of religious freedom—three great and immortal achievements. Jefferson, with a prophetic vision, looking down the corridors of time, beheld the citizen unconquered and unshackled, made in the image of God and declared for him that great slogan of "equal and exact justice to all men and exclusive privileges to none."

If Andrew Jackson was living to-day what would he do? Ah, my colleagues, he would do as he did in 1832, when organized greed undertook to control the activities and functions of the executive branch of the Government. He would set the iron heel of justice upon the pernicious practices of these unscrupulous apostles of modern banking sometimes called "frenzied finance." To-day, while it is with profound regret that our distinguished Speaker is to yield the gavel of authority in this House, to a worthy successor, yet by the solemn edict of the people commissioned by their authority we send to preside over the United States Senate the Andrew Jackson of this age, whose great ability and capacity for the task is questioned by none but admitted by all, and as he goes he carries with him the admiration and loyalty not only of the Membership of this and many previous Congresses, but the love, respect, and confidence of all the American people. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen of the House, I have asked for these few moments for the purpose of expressing what I know is in the heart and mind of every Member of this House, and particularly of those who are to be Members of the next House, and that is the regret that we all feel that we are to lose during the next session our beloved and distinguished Speaker. [Applause.]

We are proud of the great honor which has come to him in his election to the second highest office in the gift of the people, but we regret that it removes him from the House.

A newspaper the other day made the statement that I was one of the leaders in the anti-Garner faction in the House of Representatives. That was news to me. I never heard that there was any such thing as an anti-Garner faction in the House of Representatives, and there is not and never has been. [Applause.] We all love Jack Garner for his great worth and his steadfastness in his devotion to the public good and we are proud of his splendid record.

The Speaker and I—as doubtless many of you—have differed on one or two subjects of legislation, but it was always based upon a conscientious difference of opinion, and certainly no question of personality ever entered into the differences that may have existed. To say therefore that such occasional differences constituted a faction on the part of those who for the moment opposed his views is ridiculous in the extreme.

Our distinguished Speaker, may I say, has garnered everything that was good in political life up to this time, and he has done so because of his faith in the American people, his conscientious devotion to duty, and his desire to serve the people of the United States, who, in turn, have given him their support and confidence.

If there is anything left for him to garner, I wish him the best of health, and certainly he has my best wishes. [Applause.] It is with sorrow and regret that we are not to have him here to preside over this House, or as we have often seen him, in the well of the House, with that characteristic forceful manner of his in presenting and proclaiming his views.

But I want him to know that, when he comes back to visit us, often, we hope, from the other Chamber where he goes to grace the high position to which he has been chosen by a majority of the people of the United States—while under our rules he will not be permitted to speak, nor will he be permitted to preside or vote—he will certainly occupy the favored guest chair of the House of Representatives, and we shall always be honored to have him with us. [Applause.] Our earnest good wishes go with him and his splendid wife for a long life filled with the richest blessings, and with that happiness and contentment which they both so well deserve. [Applause.]

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for four minutes.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I rise at this time to say good-by to my colleagues, with whom I have worked for almost five years. I am not going to address myself to any particular legislation, because I leave that in the hands of men who I believe will take care of it. There is much important legislation I should like to see passed and have a part in it, some of which I have advocated for several years, and now I hope that under this "new deal" it will come to pass.

To-day is the last day's service that some of us will see in the House of Representatives, unless we are elected at some future time. I, being among those, wish to say to all of you at this time a most affectionate good-by.

I do this not because I feel that what I may say will be of any interest or any profit to any of you. Yet I feel greatly indebted to each and all of you for what you have done for me and the help you have given me in my humble efforts here to represent my district and every section of our country.

As I look back upon the past five years, there is hardly a one of you with whom I can not only recall pleasant personal relations but commend you upon some occasion for your earnest efforts in behalf of your people and our country; and as I leave these Halls, not knowing whether I shall have the privilege and honor of returning again or not-but I do hope I may have the privilege of addressing you in this Chamber again in the future—I shall carry with me the most pleasant recollections of you all, and I dedicate what little powers I have to the proposition that wherever my lot is cast or whenever an opportunity presents, to try to bring about in our country a better understanding of Congress and its problems and the importance of this Congress to our beloved Nation. For it is only through the Congress that our democratic Government can survive. And may I venture here to say that the success of our democracy means more to the world than some might think; for should we fail, then it would be heralded to mankind that a nation conceived in liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal and composed of those sifted by the process of elimination and initiative from the best blood of all the countries of the world has failed.

I therefore feel it of high import that each of us do his best to combat this insidious attack on our Congress. seems to me that one retiring as I will now can more effectively do that. It is my hope to do that. I realize that I fear I have not been in Congress long enough to be able to make very valuable suggestions to my colleagues left here, but you and those many splendid, patriotic new Members who are coming in have my best wishes; and it is my hope now, as a private citizen, each day to reconsecrate and rededicate myself to the ideals of patriotism which I learned at my father's and mother's knees and gleaned from the lives of great men who have led and preserved our Nation throughout its glorious history, as well as from men on both sides of this aisle since being here. And here I diverge to venture one fond hope that for at least until we have crossed over the present morass that politics be adjourned on both sides of the aisle.

As I look forward, in spite of the fact that we are in the throes of the greatest depression the world has ever seen, I still have faith in America and the American people. I think the fact that they have passed through the suffering and deprivation that they have come through in the past three years justifies the faith that the people of our country will stand as a unit for legal and constitutional methods of change where it is necessary, and that they will reach the other side of this vast abyss a cleaner and purer democracy, a stronger and more virulent people, and that the Stars and Stripes, the flag of Washington, the flag of Jefferson, the flag of Lincoln, the flag of Roosevelt, and the flag of Wilson ! will still shine in all its glory and brilliance. I believe the program of our great new leader, Franklin D. Roosevelt, will justify the faith the American people have placed in him.

This is my hope; this is my faith. And to this end I am leaving you with the best of wishes. You have my undying pledge. Good-by.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen of the House. Vermont is a Republican State. The voters have been loyal to that party for 75 years. Mr. Speaker, history records that the sons of Vermont have been at the crucial point of every crisis of our country-at the Battle of Bennington, when they turned defeat into victory and made possible Saratoga, Yorktown, and the building of our great Nation; at Chapultepec in leading a charge up those perilous heights; at Gettysburg, when the sons of Vermont met the gallant charge of those brave sons of the South; in the Spanish-American War, when Dewey opened the gates of the Orient to the civilization of the west and made possible that wonderful development of the Philippine Islands; in the World War, in which 1 in 20 of our people saw service; and in all the struggles and victories of peace. To-day the Nation is facing another crisis, of greater peril to our institutions and civilization than any other of the past. I come at this crucial period in behalf of the people of my State, in the splendid spirit of patriotism that has always actuated them, to lay on the altar of our common country a renewed pledge of our devotion and loyalty and a promise of assistance to the incoming administration in seeking the right solution of the grave problems of the day. [Applause.]

I believe these solutions will be found in the sane, commonsense ideals of our people which have made Vermont a synonym of sound and progressive government. [Applause.]

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to express the regret of the members of the subcommittee on war appropriations, and I believe, of all Members of the House, with reference to the retirement of three of our colleagues.

We are losing the services of three able and distinguished Representatives-Messrs. Barbour, Clague, and Wright.

Mr. BARBOUR, of the seventh district of California, has served in this House since March 4, 1919, from Sixty-sixth to Seventy-second Congress, seven consecutive Congresses. He has played no insignificant rôle in the subcommittee and on the floor of this House. I desire to express my deepest admiration for his sincere efforts in upholding or fighting for those things that he considered essential to the welfare of this country. Whether attacking or being attacked, at all times he revealed keen judgment and a magnanimous nature. I sincerely regret the loss of his valuable assistance in the carrying on of what has been for several sessions our common task.

Mr. CLAGUE, from the second district of Minnesota, has served from Sixty-seventh to Seventy-second Congress-six consecutive terms. Since March 4, 1921, he has devoted himself to the hard work incident to congressional life, and his advice has been extremely valuable to the members on the subcommittee on war appropriations, as well as to the Members of this House. We, too, have had our difference of view, difference in political beliefs, and differences regarding the most efficient system of maintaining the national defense of our country. Yet regardless of points of view, I highly respect him, and it is with profound regret that we bid him farewell as he returns home to his friends who have honored themselves by sending him here.

Mr. W. C. Wright, who has been a Member of this House eight consecutive sessions-Sixty-fifth to Seventy-second Congress-began his service here on January 24, 1918. In performing his congressional duties, and more especially those on the subcommittee on war appropriations, he has always displayed diligence and efficiency of the highest order. Possessing every qualification of mind and character necessary and essential for performing his tasks, his They were the backbone of my support during those years.

efforts in behalf of sound legislation have been untiring: and in this, as in every other regard, he has borne himself so as to command the respect of the Members of this body. As he separates himself from further activities in this House, the best wishes of the entire membership go with him.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of your colleagues on the Democratic side it is my very great pleasure to present to you this watch as a slight token of our respect, our esteem, and our admiration for you, so that at all times you may have this slight remembrance of your colleagues' high regard.

The SPEAKER. Major Bulwinkle, and those for whom you speak, in accepting this token of your affection, and I hope your admiration, I extend to you my sincere thanks.

There are occasions when words can not express the soul of a man, and in the closing days of this Congress, with this expression of your regard, I find myself in that condition. I have a very great affection for the Members of the House of Representatives. I leave this body without a single feeling other than a Christian one toward every Member of this House. For all of you I have a very deep feeling of friendship. I told the Members some weeks back that I regretted to leave this Chamber. That was a sincere expression.

Many journalists and some unthinking people in the land berate the Congress of the United States, especially the House of Representatives. For the past two or three years I have given some study to the political history of the Republic, more so than I have during all of my life heretofore. It is my deliberate judgment that there have been as able men in the Congress in the last 30 years, during the time that I have served, as there have ever been in the history of the Republic. There are as able men to-day in the House of Representatives, in my opinion, as there have been in any Congress in the history of the Republic. [Applause.] That is not partiality on my part. They do not stand out with the brilliancy they did 60 or 75 or 100 years ago, because for the last 30 years we have been living in a commercial age, in which we do not worship so much the intellect, the character, and the statesmanship of men as we do their ability to accumulate the thing that we worship to-day—the almighty dollar.

Permit me again, Major Bulwinkle, to express to you and to those who were kind enough to join with you in this gift, my deepest appreciation, and if I may do so on this occasion, let me extend to the Members on both sides of the aisle an invitation to visit us at the other end of the Capitol. [Applause.]

The Chair requests the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY] to kindly take the chair. [Applause.]

Mr. HAWLEY assumed the chair.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HAWLEY). Without objection, the request is granted.

There was no objection.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, there is always a tinge of sadness when we come to the closing hour of a final session of Congress. Especially is this true at this time when so large a number of our Members, men with whom we have been closely associated, men with whom we have worked for so many years, are leaving us to enter some other field of endeavor.

It is not my purpose at this time to attempt to mention by name the unusually large number of men who have held important positions in this House, men who have helped bear the burdens and who have done the real work, who are going from us to-day, but I do trust that I be pardoned if I mention three of the men with whom I have been most closely associated for a great many years, namely, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PURNELL], the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Michener], and the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. Bachmann].

Mr. PURNELL and Mr. MICHENER were members of the Rules Committee for eight years when I was its chairman. And for the last two years, when it has been my privilege to occupy the position of leader on the minority side, those two gentlemen, together with Mr. Bachmann, have given me most loyal and enthusiastic support, and I want them to know that I fully appreciate their helpful cooperation.

To all of those Members who are going out from us, and I mean Members on both sides of the aisle, I want you to know that you leave enjoying the highest regard, respect, and esteem of your colleagues in the House. Whether you return to Washington, either as public servants or private citizens, you will always receive a warm welcome from the Members of the House of Representatives. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution which I send to the desk, and on it I ask recognition.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York offers a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 408

Resolved, That the thanks of the House are presented to the Hon. John Nance Garner, Speaker of the House of Representatives, for the able, impartial, and dignified manner in which he has presided over the deliberations and performed the arduous duties of the Chair during the present term of Congress.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, it is with a great deal of pleasure that I offer this resolution at this time, first, because of my long and intimate personal friendship with the present Speaker of this House; secondly, because I offer it as a Member of the minority of the Seventy-second Congress as an expression of the Republican Members.

No man has ever reached the elevation of Speaker of this House by mere accident. He must have proven to his associates that he has character, ability, and experience. The present Speaker has so proven in marked degree. During the period he has presided over this House he has added luster not only to his own name but to the House and to the country. He has always presided with candor, fairness, firmness, and dispatch, and I want you, Mr. Speaker, and your good helpmeet, Mrs. Garner, to know, as you leave this House to-day, that you leave it with the high esteem and affectionate regard of your associates in the House. [Applause]

As you go to take up similar duties in another body, we wish you that same success, that same enjoyment in the performance of your duty that you have always experienced in the House of Representatives; and may God speed you in your new work. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HAWLEY). The question is on the resolution presented by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL].

The resolution was unanimously agreed to.

The SPEAKER resumed the chair.

The SPEAKER. Ladies and gentlemen of the House, especially my friend Mr. SNELL, I probably appreciate this resolution more than previous Speakers have ordinarily appreciated resolutions of this type for many years.

As you all know, I have known Mr. SNELL for quite a long time. Our association has been pleasant. It has not only endeared him to me as a friend but has proven to me that he has a very high quality of statesmanship. He has one quality that is so lacking in public men to-day, and that is the quality of saying "no" and sticking to it. In entering into agreements, in dealing with Mr. SNELL, I do not think we ever misunderstood each other except on one occasion, and then I was probably wrong. [Applause.]

To my Republican friends, I want to extend my appreciation of the courtesy you have shown me while a Member of the House, especially as Speaker. The personal friendships formed among the membership are very dear to me, and I believe are reciprocated by many in this audience.

I have thrown bricks, but I have received them. [Laughter.] You have not complained and you have not heard me complain. As long as you make a fight for what you believe is the best interest of the Republic, even if you do it through partisanship, you are serving this Republic. I believe in partisanship. I believe in party organization. I believe this country must be continued under the Constitution through political parties, and I doubt whether there can ever be more than two political parties, in view of the fact that the premier must be continued for four years.

In some ways it is to be regretted that the gentleman from New York in the incoming Congress will not have quite as large a following as he has had in this Congress. The best proportion for the House of Representatives, could it be arranged that way, is a majority of about 50 or 60 on one side, whether it be Republican or Democrat. By this I do not mean to say I am not very happy, as a partisan and as a candidate for office at the last election, that the Democratic Party gathered in as many of the brethren as it did. We are very glad to have three hundred and odd Members in the House. I speak only of an ideal House and an ideal division, whether it be a 50 or 60 Republican majority or a 50 to 60 Democratic majority.

I believed Mr. SNELL when he said for the press and the country that under conditions now existing he intended to surrender his partisanship and devote himself to cooperation to a larger degree than he ordinarily would do, and I commend him for that undertaking. I hope and believe that his associates will join with the Democrats in undertaking, without reference to party considerations, to improve the conditions of the country to the extent that they can be improved by legislation.

I am very much obliged to you, Mr. Snell, for introducing the resolution. [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

APPRECIATION TO THE MEMBERSHIP OF THE HOUSE

Mr. YON. Mr. Speaker, in asking leave to extend my remarks I am doing so that I may express my appreciation to the membership of this House for the very gracious attitude its Members have accorded me during the six years I have had the privilege of serving in this, the greatest legislative body in the world.

Mr. Speaker, to you in particular do I want to express my thanks for your courteous consideration of my welfare during the time prior to your assuming the Speakership, as minority leader, and ranking Democrat on the Ways and Means Committee, as well as since you have been Speaker. You have allowed me as good places on committee assignments as I deserved, and the one especially that I most desired, that of Rivers and Harbors.

Of course, during the six years of service I have had here times have changed from what we, or most of the Congress, thought in 1927 a prosperous era in the country. Then came the most appalling crash in our economic structure, nearly four years ago, and I, along with others of my colleagues, have struggled with the ever-increasing number of problems in an endeavor to relieve the distress of the destitute millions of our population. Mr. Speaker, I have not always voted with the Democrats but only when I thought the interests of the section I represented were at variance with that of the party, as I always have considered the needs of my State, on account of location, climate, products, and so forth, entitled it to such consideration, as especially pertaining to tariff legislation, and since I was directed along this course by the legislature of my State in the 1929 session memorializing the Florida delegation in Congress to vote for the tariff bill then under consideration, and my honorable successor was a member of that legislature and voted for the resolution. Now, Mr. Speaker, I am solicitous of the welfare of not only my district and State but for that of the whole of the United States. A new administration of the affairs of the Government is imminent. That great American, whose ancestry comes from the earliest pioneers of the Empire State, F. D. Roosevelt, will be at the helm from March 4, and you, Mr. Speaker, will be next in command. Your responsibility is great, and the problems the most difficult in our country's history. Leadership is necessary; patriotism of only the noblest kind will save the situation.

Mr. Speaker, after all when I look back through the past few years and askance of the depression, and its terrible effects from a local viewpoint, and the results to aid my people even under a Republican administration I am happy that I have served to assist them during these dark days. My going from among you is a result of a restless and impatient public mind brought on by the depression which I had no part in bringing about, and the approach of which I prophesied as the natural consequence of an unchecked and high-handed speculation in the security and commodity markets without thought or consideration given to the problems of the producers of our farm and forest products, thereby creating a lopsided economic condition.

As a Representative of my people I have always endeavored to do those things that I thought was for their best interest, both individually and collectively. There were certain specific undertakings I promised when making my first campaign. These promises have been fulfilled, or they are in process of fulfillment. I promised to exert my best efforts in bringing about the improvement of our waterways, including St. Marks River, Choctawhatchee-East Pass, and Mobile-Pensacola Canal. Of these projects, the two former have been attended to. The Mobile-Pensacola Canal is under construction. In addition, the intercoastal waterway projects of Apalachicola-St. Andrews Canal has been reported on favorably by my Committee on Rivers and Harbors for an enlarged improvement from 5 feet depth, 65 feet width, to 9 feet depth, 100 feet width. This project resurveyed and recommendations made for improvement in compliance with my resolution adopted by Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

The Choctawhatchee-West Bay Canal was reported favorably by Chief of Engineers, and report has been considered favorably by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and the same action taken on a project to widen and deepen channel of Pensacola Harbor. The St. Andrews Bay project is now in the Board of Engineers, and I hope for a favorable report thereon from the board. So, therefore, I my efforts in behalf of waterway development in my district have been resultant of more progress than in previous 25 years. The Gulf Coast Highway, in my district, has been federalized. The efforts I have put forth in connection with this great undertaking will be borne out by the records in my file, as correspondence will show that I was frequently endeavoring that the Bureau of Roads recognize the importance of this highway, and at this time two bridges are being constructed, or contracts let for them from Federal-aid road funds from the emergency-relief funds on this highway. I supported the legislation to provide the funds, as well as funds that are being expended in the Choctawhatchee National Forest to complete other important roads in the district. I have been ever on the alert in furthering the development of the naval air station, and anyone who had seen the station there of five or six years ago, and should go and see it now, would recognize the changes that have taken place, even though I have not accomplished all that I would like to have accomplished. The naval air station will not be abandoned, as some alarmists would have the public believe. The Navy Department is proud of Pensacola, and the Naval Affairs Committee chairman, Mr. Vinson, has assured me frequently that the Congress is for Pensacola Naval Air Station.

Farm-relief legislation has had my loyal support even though the legislation offered was not what I thought the best, but was all I had a chance to support and vote for. I have always felt the need of organization amongst the agricultural groups and have urged in and out of season before I came to Congress, and since I came here, that this be done.

The turpentine interests I have worked faithfully for, and this work has been shown an appreciation for in the form of a resolution adopted by the Gum Turpentine Rosin Marketing Association thanking me, as well as other southern Members of Congress, for efforts put forth in the interest of this group of producers, and I firmly believe that, if mistakes had not been made in certain particulars by the Gum Turpentine Rosin Marketing Association, the industry would not have fallen in the bad way it has after the product of gum turpentine was declared an agricultural commodity by Congress. In the crop-production loans for farmers I have not only supported legislation for same but have assisted in every way possible in seeing that these farmers who needed help or who did not raise anything to eat for their families got what they were entitled to. I have encouraged the farm boys and girls of the 4-H clubs to greater endeavor in leadership and better living by giving cash prizes each year to add to this encouragement. The association with these young people will remain ever as amongst my most pleasant memories as a Member of this House.

On all matters that have been considered by boards, bureaus, commissions, and on legislation affecting my State and the Nation I have been on hand and registered a protest when action undertaken was detrimental to my people's interest and supported those projects and measures when the interest of my people, as the records of hearings will show, before the Bureau of Plant Quarantine and Control, the Tariff Commission, the Customs Bureau, and other bureaus in the Government and committees of the House.

I opposed the sales tax and auto excise and gasoline tax both before the Ways and Means Committee and on the

As a member of the Pension Committee for four years I was in position to assist in passing legislation beneficial to veterans. As a member of the Public Lands Committee, of which I am vice chairman, I have reported many bills affecting my constituency and also the proposed Everglades National Park bill.

As a member of the Rivers and Harbors Committee for this Congress I have been in position to expedite the projects to favorable consideration that has already been mentioned in these remarks, but since I am going out of Congress and losing my place on the Rivers and Harbors Committee I do not know what future progress will be made on these projects that so vitally affect the development of my district and State.

As to prohibition and the eighteenth amendment, I voted for the repeal amendment, that refers this question back to the States, where I hope it will be settled for good and all.

Of course, the apportionment of Federal funds to my district naturally has come from the Federal Treasury, and all our citizens are complaining of high taxes and the cost of the National Government, but yet I maintain that my people have gotten as much as from five to ten times more out of the Treasury than they have paid in and that the burden of taxation that hangs so heavily on the shoulders of the people has been brought about on account of local taxes in the counties, subdistricts, and municipalities, resulting from heavy bonded indebtedness voted by the people themselves for various improvements in the way of roads, streets, schools, and otherwise. The cost of these improvements, as well as the national public debt, is laying a heavy toll upon the American people in the way of taxes, and this, added to those of ordinary operation of the subdivisions of the Government, is costing the people too much for the traffic to bear when commodity prices are so low that the prices for same will not pay the cost of production, let alone the high

In closing will say that it has been a pleasure to me that the Senators from Florida have been so helpful in assisting me in all matters that have affected the interest of our people back home, and I have at all times been happy in my association and cooperation with them, and I will always cherish in my memory the pleasure of these associations, as well as with my colleagues in the House, and, after all, I want the membership of the House to know that as I leave this Hall I go with a feeling of a duty well done, and a fond farewell and Godspeed to all is my wish.

THE DUTY WE OWE TO THE PRESIDENT IN TIME OF NATIONAL EMERGENCY

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, we will shortly leave this House and proceed as a body to participate in the inauguration of another President of the United States—Franklin D. Roosevelt.

The condition of the country is such that everyone is duty bound to think in terms of what is best for America. Political partisanship has no rightful place in such a time as this. Everyone should be ready and willing to support measures that have in them any promise or hope of relief without regard to the party label they may bear.

The President of the United States is our President—Democrats and Republicans alike. He seeks to lead us out of our present difficulties. If he succeeds, and God help that he may, we all benefit. If he does not, we all suffer. We all go up together or we all go down together. His responsibility is great. His burden is heavy. It should not be made heavier by political bickerings or partisanship. He is Commander in Chief of our forces. We owe him the same loyalty and hearty cooperation we would be willing to give in time of war. Our present emergency is equally serious as that of war. Consequently, the President is entitled to have the same full measure of loyalty.

If present powers are insufficient for the President to adequately meet and deal with the crisis, then he should have such additional powers as he may deem necessary. There should be no fear in placing in his hands extraordinary or unusual powers. They would be sought and used by him for the common good. A sincere desire to promote the welfare of our people would actuate the President in such a request. To deny him greater power, if and when requested, would be to question his motives. The high purpose for which the power would be sought is sufficient justification for Congress to grant, extend, and increase the same in the hands of the President so long as the emergency and necessity therefor shall require. Patriotism must supersede partisanship.

ADJOURNMENT SINE DIE

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn sine die.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 11 o'clock and 21 minutes a. m.) the House adjourned sine die.
